At 8:38 p.m., a hit-and-run accident was reported at 526 Thurston St. involving the parked and unattended vehicle owned by Walter R. Smith, 526 Thurston St. and an unidentified white pickup truck.

At 10:02 p.m., a notice to appear was issued to Derel Gene Riddles, Rt. 2 Box 194, Comanche, Okla., for driving on a suspended driver's license.

At 7:55 p.m., a juvenile was arrested at 1622 Houston St. on Riley County warrant 91-JV111 for possession of a controlled substance and drug paraphernalia. A juvenile detention report was filed.

At 11:20 p.m., Michel A. Lee, 104 Elm, Ogden, was arrested for DUI and released on $500 bond.

TUESDAY

At 7:31 a.m., Tara Ewing, 1961 Zeandale Rd., advised someone was shooting at her turkeys, and her father was out looking for the shooter. The subject was not located and none of the turkeys were injured.

At 1:13 p.m., a woman at the Purvis residence, 715 Allen Rd., advised she believed her washing machine was on fire. The Manhattan Fire Department was notified.

At 1:05 p.m., a major-damage, non-injury accident was reported at 3000 Tuttle Creek Blvd. involving the parked and unattended vehicle owned by Dean Toothaker, 1417 Lilac Lane, Wamego, and Mark Burton, 3000 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Bush says Gorbachev the man to 'deal with'

'... I am very happy to see my friend again,' president says

The Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — President Bush on Tuesday wrapped a reassuring arm around Mikhail Gorbachev, declaring the embattled Soviet leader is the man the United States will "deal with" in renewed talks to reduce long-range nuclear weapons.

In their first face-to-face meeting since the aborted Soviet coup three months ago, Bush also promised food and other humanitarian aid to help Gorbachev's economically weak nation. But he gave no indication at their joint news conference that he was prepared to provide direct financial assistance.

Together, Bush and Gorbachev will open the historic Mideast peace conference on Wednesday. And after their two-hour lunch Tuesday they appealed to Arabs and Israelis to reconcile their differences.

Bush used the news conference to stress his respect for the Soviet leader and his determination to keep working with him in the face of pressure from individual Soviet republics for separate dealings with the United States.

"I have had a history of very satisfactory negotiations with President Gorbachev," Bush said. He said his administration and the American people support Gorbachev in seeking Soviet reform, "and so we'll deal with what's there. And I am very happy to see my friend again."

Despite the coup attempt, which left Gorbachev under arrest for three days, "I sense no difference in how we talk and the frankness with which we exchange views; no difference certainly from my standpoint, in the respect level for President Gorbachev."

Gorbachev bristled when a Soviet reporter asked who was in charge in Moscow while he was in Madrid. "I'm still the president," said Gorbachev, who faces challenges to his power from the restive republics. "Nobody's taking my place."

As for arms reductions, Bush said, "Our schedules are very close." He said he would send Undersecretary of State Reginald Bartholomew and other U.S. experts to Moscow to try to bridge differences in the sweeping proposals the two leaders made last month.

He said the two men want to go forward with ratification of two existing arms control treaties covering long-range nuclear weapons and conventional forces in Europe.

"There's nothing to worry about," Gorbachev said of the differences in approach.

He was as casual in describing his own post-coup position: "I didn't lose my balance then and I haven't lost it now."

Bush in September and then Gorbachev earlier this month announced the scrapping of thousands of short-range nuclear weapons and called for prompt negotiations to reduce U.S. and Soviet stockpiles of long-range weapons, even beyond the terms of the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty they signed in Moscow in July.

However, Gorbachev went further than Bush and also urged a cessation of underground nuclear tests, a proposition that received a cool reception at the Pentagon.

Evidently, the two leaders cut no deals over lunch. But both said their positions were extremely close. "And now," Bush said, "what we've got to do is iron out more details, have more discussion."

Gorbachev said he and Bush had met to "synchronize our watches" on a wide range of subjects.

The Soviet leader outlined for Bush again his nation's economic plight and his efforts to reform its system into something closer to a free-market operation.

"No specifics have been agreed on" for U.S. food and other humanitarian aid, Bush said after their meeting. Gorbachev added that Western experts were still assessing Soviet needs.

The United States has pledged $2.5 billion in credits during the past year. Gorbachev has asked for an additional $3.5 billion in loan guarantees and $1 billion in food and medical aid.

Administration officials said Bush was near a decision on approving additional credits for Soviet purchases of American grain.

Author, historian addresses new initiates of Kappa Omicron Nu honorary

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian Reporter

The origins of human ecology are science-based, not kitchen-based.

Ruth Schwartz Cowan, author, historian and former director of women's studies at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, spoke Tuesday afternoon on "Ellen Swallow Richards and the Origins of Human Ecology."

The event was part of an initiation for new members of the Kappa Omicron Nu chapter at K-State. The 29 members were the first to be initiated into the Human Ecology honorary. Previously, the chapter was Omicron Nu and had recently merged with Kappa Omicron Nu for financial reasons.

Jean Sego, assistant dean of human ecology, said it is important for students to know the history of human ecology.

"We have foremothers, the same as we have forefathers in this country," Sego said. "We all need to know our roots and have an appreciation for whence we came."

Cowan related some of the history of human ecology to the previous ceremony for new initiates.

"While I was sitting in front watching the new initiates, I tried to think of how Ellen Richards would have felt were she here. I hope she felt the same way that I do," Cowan said. "It is important to be proud of the roots of human ecology."

The roots of human ecology begin with Richards. She was the first woman to attend the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Richards applied to attend MIT in 1863 at the age of 26. She was neither of popular age to be attending a university nor popular sex to attend the school.

After months of deliberation, she was allowed by the board to attend MIT and admitted as a special case.

Her case was special because not only was she the only woman to attend within the next 13 years, but she wasn't required to pay tuition. Because she didn't pay tuition, the board was able to say she wasn't a real student.

In 1899, 16 years after her graduation from MIT, Cowan, along with 11 others, met at Lake Placid, N.Y., to organize a new profession.

"They didn't just want to create a new profession out of their own bittered experiences," Cowan said. "They wanted to create a profession that women could control."

"We're not coming out of a cooking and sewing laboratory, that's left to the cooking schools," Sego said.

money to domestic problems in the United States.

"If the United States government were a parent it would be guilty of child abuse," Sklar said. "One out of four children are born into poverty."

A national health care system could prevent many deaths among the poor, she said.

"Instead of wealth trickling down to the needy," she said, "wealth is flooding up the truly greedy."

She said there is a deficit of humanity, not a deficit of money.

In the United States, education is rationed by income. Many state university systems are suffering from budget cuts, and less money is available for federal loans and grants for lower income students.

"We don't lack money, we lack willingness to change priorities," she said.

they violently opposed when it was first offered during the Israeli-Egyptian peace process in 1978.

The extent and duration of autonomy would be left open to discussion.

Advisers to the delegation attributed the new pragmatism to political changes — the Palestinians lost the Soviets and Eastern Europe as power bases after the collapse of Communism, and the PLO's backing for Iraq in the Gulf War cost Palestinians the friendship and financial backing of Arab oil states.

Hanan Ashrawi, the Palestinian delegation's spokeswoman who also was involved in the pre-conference negotiations with Baker, stressed that Jewish settlements were "one of the greatest obstacles to peace."

But one Palestinian adviser said that although freezing construction of settlements was important, it was no longer a condition. The adviser, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the Palestinians were determined not to be defeated in the first round "by demanding something we cannot get."

He also said the Palestinians won't walk out on talks.

A Palestine Liberation Organization delegation, led by Nabil Shaath, political adviser to Chairman Yasser Arafat, plans to monitor the peace talks.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Rights too important for political pettiness

Perhaps something good is going to come out of the Anita Hill-Clarence Thomas circus.

President Bush has finally accepted a compromise on the Senate's civil rights bill after some of the wording was changed. Those changes have not been released.

Some senators, including Thomas mentor John Danforth, R-Mo., have said they think the heightened awareness of sexual harassment is a contributing factor to Bush's willingness to compromise.

But while Bush and the senators are patting themselves on the back for getting mature about civil rights, they shouldn't forget the childish accusations they made during the past two years and the misinformation about the bill, which is circulating.

Bush has continually rejected it claiming it established hiring quotas. Supporters say the opposite, that it actually outlawed such quotas. A lot of name calling ensued in between.

Danforth even said Bush's advisers deliberately misled him about the bill's intent and content.

The lesson here is communication. The petty squabbling between Bush and Congress has gone far enough and accomplished little more than a shouting match of "Did not," "Did too."

The bill isn't perfect yet. It gives more weight to race-bias cases than sexual discrimination or harassment. It still needs to be passed by both Senate and the House of Representatives.

Now that the people working on the civil rights bill have gained Bush's support, we'd like to see them concentrate on its meaning and purpose, not the semantics and their personal differences.

Landfill Contamination calls for immediate action

Four years ago the Riley County Landfill was ordered to be closed by June 1991.

Here it is the end of October, and it is still open. But it's OK, because the landfill has been given an indefinite extension.

Usually, giving someone an extension on a deadline does no harm to others. It just means paying a parking ticket a little later or getting a letter grade lower on a term paper.

But giving a landfill an extension on its closure date may endanger lives.

The landfill has used the indefinite extension to remain open despite an order by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment that it must be closed due to groundwater contamination.

And, it is not recent contamination that has done any real damage. It is contamination that has existed since 1985 when cancer-causing agents were found in groundwater in residences surrounding the landfill.

And it didn't stop there. In 1988, diesel fuel was dumped in the landfill against regulations.

The Waste Management Committee has said the landfill will be closed as soon as it can temporarily transfer the waste to Topeka or Perry. It is estimated that will take about a year.

What is this talk of "temporary transfer" and as soon as possible in a year? That just isn't good enough. Not for the residents who live near the landfill with cancer-causing agents in the water.

This blatant disregard for rules is deplorable. Extensions are not made to be "indefinite," or why have them at all?

This is a time when something must be done immediately, and rules must be followed.

Through the eyes of another

Halloween provides perfect opportunity

The world is in a serious state of spiritual schizophrenia. There is no standard, no universal truth. There is no absolute (upon which all peoples all over the world will agree) that answers the complex of soul-felt questions confronting us on what is, more or less, an everyday basis.

Don't worry, this column is not about the meaning of life. This column is not about any reputed inadequacy of organized religion. This column is, rather, about the only day of the year that you can, in effect, safely shed the personality that binds you to your life and your world and live your life and see your world through other eyes. That day is, of course, Halloween.

In some circles these days, it is fashionable to regard Halloween as a dangerous holiday.

Some worry it promotes and encourages violence, that it may have started out as an other-than-Christian celebration of witches. (And it may have, for all this writer knows about the origins of the day.)

These complaints, however, say less about the holiday in its modern incarnation and more about the society at large, which simultaneously harbors and opposes Halloween. There is no "general public" anymore (if there ever was). Society today — in this country, at least — is divided into special interest groups, opposing peoples, armed camps.

Maybe society at large could learn something from Halloween.

Is there really any harm, after all, in children dressing up as ghosts and witches and Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles — things they are not — to satisfy their sweet tooth for one day a year?

Considering the state of the country and the world today, maybe there is a still greater utility for Halloween.

Why limit it to children? Why not let all people pretend to be something they're not, one day a year?

Of course, there would have to be limits. It probably wouldn't be safe to let ultra-conservatives play Nazis.

But maybe President Bush could pretend to be one of the country's homeless for a day. He could hit the streets without the protection of his Secret Service or the support of the Republican Party, spend the night in an alley and take one uncensored look at the kind of life a substantial number of Americans continue to lead.

Gay bashers could spend a day looking through the eyes of those against whom they discriminate. They could consider that homosexuals and lesbians lead lives that are not in all respects so different from their own.

And school officials everywhere could spend one day trying to get an education. While students fill the roles of their administrators and gain their own understanding of the administrative challenges, school officials could get a first-hand look at the various stresses that affect students. And they could perhaps begin to understand some of the subtler components of the education crisis this country is facing.

It's just an idea, but it might help. The thing we must understand is that the distance between people — all people — is not so great. We need only to put on another mask, assume another role, to begin to understand — to begin to learn and know.

Halloween is tomorrow. How about it?

THANK YOU FOR YOUR HELP

I would like to thank K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom and all the other police officers and dispatchers for being frank and responsive to our requests and during interviews. We have had several stories on campus crime and focused a series on rape. Through all of our stories, the campus police have been a valuable resource.

Because of a piece of legislation called the Buckley Amendment, the names of victims of crimes on campus cannot be released by the campus police. The original intent of the Buckley Amendment was to protect the academic records of students.

Nationwide, universities and colleges have interpreted the amendment as not being able to release names of people involved in campus crimes. At K-State, the administration and the Kansas Board of Regents have decided to follow this interpretation. By doing this, students are not allowed to know if the person next door in the residence halls or the person who walks with them from class is somebody who is being investigated on drug charges or someone who was involved in an assault.

This type of information would be available from any municipal, county or state police force, but the Buckley Amendment prevents campus police from divulging this information — information that is public for the benefit of the community.

The Collegian realizes that withholding this information is the policy of the University and not of the K-State Police.

This semester, the Collegian is publishing the police reports from both the Riley County Police Department and the campus police. Chief Beckom and his staff have been very helpful in gathering the information they are able to release.

Congress is currently writing new legislation to clear-up the different interpretations of the Buckley Amendment. After the legislation is approved, campus crime reports will be able to be released in their entirety.

Situation haunts student's conscienceERIN MANSUR-SMITH GUEST
Erin Mansur-Smith is a sophomore in English.

I feel I must apologize to someone. I've been thinking about it for more than a week now. And the more I think, the more ashamed I become, the more upset I feel about what I did. So upset that I want to personally apologize to the people I offended. Unfortunately, I don't know their names.

It was in Aggieville after a game. A couple of friends and I were walking around watching people make fools of themselves and behaving a little foolishly ourselves. We were walking down an alley behind one of the bars and came upon a situation.

There were four men — two were standing on one side and the other two were not five feet away from them.

One guy was holding up his buddy, who was obviously extremely inebriated. He had his arms around his waist and neck and was half bent over trying to keep himself and his friend upright.

The other two were standing with their arms crossed and beers in their hands, wearing what I always called the "good ol' boys" look — a look with a cross between backwater ignorance, hate and intolerance. They were just standing there watching the other man struggle.

At first I thought someone had said something in the heat of drunkenness that had been carried outside. Then the man who was holding his friend up, leaned over and looked at him with such concern. It was a look I had seen between lovers.

"Why can't you just leave us alone?" he asked one of the good ol' boys. "We're not doing anything to you."

One of the good ol' boys just traced the toe of his ropers in the dirt and smiled.

"We don't like to leave your kind alone," he said. His friend laughed.

As the man shifted his buddy a little, he looked up at me with a look I will never forget. It was a look of desperation, resignation, anger, a little sadness and something else. It was a look I had seen on the face of my young brother when an elderly white man had called him a nigger.

As the man shifted his buddy a little, he looked up at me with a look I will never forget. It was a look of desperation, resignation, anger, a little sadness and something else. It was a look I had seen on the face of my young brother when an elderly white man had called him a nigger. I had seen on the face of a friend of mine when he was faced with a building that was inaccessible to his wheelchair. It was the look of someone facing subtle persecution and their determination to survive it.

It was a look directed at me, and I turned away from it. I turned and walked away.

I don't know what I could have done. Getting in the middle of four guys about to throw punches sincerely clashed with my survival instinct, and I doubt I would have been much help. But I could have acknowledged him. I could have shown him I saw and understood and that I was sorry for what he was about to go through.

But I didn't. I walked away, my friends walked away, and that was supposed to be the end of the episode. But it isn't the end. Not for me.

To those two men, I wish to say I am sorry. Sorry you live in a society that won't let you love who you want. Sorry for the pain you went through — that night and for the rest of your lives. And sorry that I was too afraid to show my support and admiration for your courage. There was no excuse for what I did. And I'm sorry.

Service fraternity executes projects on, off campus

Alpha Phi Omega members develop leadership skills

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

K-State students are revitalizing their skills in leadership, friendship and service through the revival of Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity.

The organization began nationwide in 1925, based on the principles of the Boy Scouts of America.

Its original intention was to give college students the opportunity to apply the Scouting ideals to a similar organization.

Throughout the years, the fraternity has grown to provide membership to anybody, regardless of gender, previous experience in the Boy Scouts, or membership in a residential fraternity or sorority.

The K-State chapter was active in meeting and performing service projects both on campus and in the community during the 1960s and 1970s. But it faded out in the early 1980s.

During the mid-'80s, the fraternity had no active members, but it still existed on paper. Faced with the pressure to either close or rebuild K-State's chapter, representatives from the national office in Independence, Mo., came to Manhattan to educate students about the group.

"About 15 of us gathered and found out what it was all about," said Stan Piezuch, junior in mechanical engineering and chapter president.

"It was merely existing, so we just decided to make the commitment not to let it fold."

Alpha Phi Omega members nationwide execute their service and leadership skills when working on projects.

Piezuch said the most special part of being in the group is though there are a few national guidelines for projects, there is no set pattern. This allows members to be more creative and outgoing in their service.

The group finished its first project, cleaning Manhattan Day Care Center, Oct. 13.

Members painted equipment, mowed the grass and built a shed.

Mike Katz, junior in statistics and group member, said he thought the completion of this project encouraged the group to continue working on both community service projects and charity fund raisers.

"It took a little longer to finish than we expected, so we took a break," he said.

"During the break, everybody talked about how they were having a good time while getting the project done. We got some real positive feedback."

Students make goodwill gesture

Soviet Union to receive 1 million pairs of blue jeans

JENNIFER RICHARDS
Collegian Reporter

A team of students from a business strategies class taught by faculty adviser Fred Rice, director of the KSU Small Business Institute, is organizing a project to collect and send a million pairs of blue jeans to the Soviet Union before Christmas.

"We see this as a goodwill gesture of students helping students," said Trevor Hinz, senior in management and member of the team.

The team has asked local businesses to join in and participate in the project.

Collection points will be at various businesses yet to be announced throughout the Manhattan area. Stan Hayes, a local businessman, is helping the student team with the planning involved in the task.

Rice said the idea evolved while watching television.

"I was watching the night tanks were going up to the (Russian Parliament building) and the people looked like Americans," he said.

Rice said he thought sending jeans to the students would be a good gesture to students in an area that was experiencing repression.

"The purpose is to help students and possibly recruit them to the United States to learn the free market," Rice said.

Anyone sending jeans will be given a note card to write their name and address on and any message they may want to write, said Theresa Ramsey, senior in business administration.

"This is our way of seeing who got the jeans and setting up a pen-pal system between the two," Ramsey said.

Letters have been sent to the Small Business Institutes at 550 colleges and universities in the United States asking other schools to become involved in encouraging American college students to donate used, clean and serviceable jeans. Each school is asked to provide a faculty contact and a group of student volunteers to promote and organize Operation Blue Jeans on each campus.

At the present time the team has been receiving letters back from various universities interested in participating. A business plan is being created by the team and is currently being sent to students who have replied back to the team.

"It's going to take more than a few people to be a success," Ramsey said. "We're expecting 10,000 jeans from Manhattan."

Mass murder rumor spreading

New England area students frightened by massacre stories

By the Associated Press

BOSTON — A rumor of an impending mass murder is spreading across college campuses in the Northeast, prompting some schools to call meetings and issue statements to comfort worried students.

"We had to tell students, 'Relax, you're not going to die in your sleep,'" said Donald Stewart, a spokesman for Wheaton College in Norton, Mass.

The rumor, which has been heard in at least six colleges from New Hampshire to Connecticut, comes in several versions.

In one version, a psychic appearing on the Oprah Winfrey show has predicted that a massacre will occur on a New England campus sometime around Halloween. In another, the killings are supposedly predicted in the writings of Nostradamus, the 16th-century mystic.

"Some students thought it was hysterically funny, and some thought it was ridiculous," said Grace McNamara, a spokeswoman at Franklin Pierce College in Rindge, N.H., where the rumor began spreading last week.

"The general attitude here is to kind of mock the whole thing," said Jason Kauppi, a senior at the University of Connecticut in Storrs. "People are trying to scare each other because it's Halloween."

But at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, women living in two dormitories were so frightened that nearly 100 of them met with the campus police chief.

In Amherst, the rumor was of killings at a campus with a pond and a building named for President Kennedy — landmarks that do exist on that campus.

"Who knows, maybe U Mass. was mentioned by Nostradamus 400 years ago," said Preston Foreman, an editor of the Daily Collegian, the student newspaper.

TIM BEYMER

Players' demands crazy

Less than one day after leading his team to the World Series crown, Jack Morris filed for baseball's free agency. Morris earned $3.65 million this season, including $150,000 in bonus money.

He now wants to strike a new deal with the Twins — one that will pay him more money than he got this year.

Money makes the world go round. Franchise owners know it, fans know it, and most of all, players know it. But is any athlete worth $4 million a year just because he can throw a 96 mph curve ball?

Pittsburgh slugger Bobby Bonilla turned down a $16.8 million, four-year deal with the Pirates. He would earn more than $4 million a year. He did hit .302 on the season with 18 home runs and 100 RBIs. But even Bobby has to chuckle when he realizes he is turning down $4.2 million a year to play a game that children play.

Can Bonilla actually look at himself in the mirror when he wakes up and tell himself that he is worth $4 million. If he read his box scores after the National League Championship Series, he would have to say "No."

What ever happened to fan appreciation and loyalty to the team? I watched the welcome back party for the Atlanta Braves after they lost the World Series. When the players got to the airport they were greeted by a deafening crowd. For a 21-year-old player like Steve Avery, the thrill of playing the game that he loves in front of a home crowd that supports his team should be worth more to him than the size of his paycheck.

Danny Tartabull is another player that has filed for free agency. Tartabull, like Bonilla, had an outstanding year at the plate. But unlike Bonilla, Tartabull has been frequently injured and inconsistent since joining the Royals. He undoubtedly will get some big offers from some other teams, offers that will be hard to pass up. Imagine what it would be like if Tartabull turned down a high-dollar offer to stay in Kansas City because he liked the people and the Royals organization more than a little pay raise.

The average baseball player in the majors earns $1 million. With all of these megabuck-makers, baseball fans can't afford to have a favorite baseball team. Players bounce from one team to another as their paychecks get larger.

There are players who claim that they take the high-dollar deals because they are looking out for their families. I admire that attitude among athletes. But when a player does not perform on the field, how can he ask for a salary increase?

Simplify the solution and offer pay raises to players based on last season's statistics and overall performance. In 1988, Danny Manning and Mitch Richmond were both selected in the first round of the NBA draft. Richmond signed a contract worth a lot less than what Manning was getting paid.

Why was Manning worth more money than Richmond? Neither one of them had played a minute in the pros.

Richmond went on to become the NBA Rookie of the Year, while Manning, after coming back from an injury, has been reduced to an overpaid sixth man.

Richmond is now one of the top players in the NBA, even though his salary is comparable to players with less ability. Richmond is a player who plays basketball because he loves the game.

He will get more money the next time his contract ends. But it is refreshing to see athletes of his ability and salary not complain about the money.

Nobody is worth $4 million a year, even an athlete who can dunk a basketball or hit a ball 420 feet. There is some nobility in those achievements, though.

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Staff

Linebackers Chris Patterson (34) and Brent Venables (36) drag down Colorado wingback Michael Westbrook as he bobbles a pass in Saturday's 10-0 loss to the Buffaloes. The Wildcat defense has given up only 46 points in its last four games at KSU Stadium.

Defense pleases Snyder

Improved attitude helps Cats compete with league's powers

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

At least in the past three weeks, K-State football coach Bill Snyder must be wondering which team will show up on the field.

On Oct. 12, the K-State defense kept the team in the KU game, giving Paul Watson and the rest of the seniors a chance to beat the intra-state rival.

Against Nebraska, the offense put points on the board, while the defense could not stop the vaunted Nebraska offense late in the game.

The defense returned to form Saturday at home against Colorado. But to look at this game, one would have to say both offenses had off days.

Still, K-State's defense did what it had to do, which was to contain Colorado quarterback Darian Hagan.

With the Oklahoma offense being as good as it has ever been, K-State will once again have to rely on the defense to keep them in the game.

Coming into the contest, Oklahoma ranks No. 16 nationally and third in the conference with 230 rushing yards per game. They are sixth in the conference with 145 yards passing per game and third in the conference with 376 yards of total offense.

"They're a very solid team," said senior nose tackle Evan Simpson. "If we have the same type of game as we did last week we'll have more than a good shot at them."

In the last three games, K-State has come up short, but the defense, according to Snyder, has gotten better over that time.

"I can't say that it has totally matured," Snyder said. "But it has matured a lot this year."

"We've made good strides defensively. Our kids are playing well and they're playing hard. It's just like anything else. You become a little more accomplished, the more opportunities you have."

The turning point for the defense, however, may have been the 56-3 debacle at the hands of Washington.

This is when the team, and especially the defense, started to grow up, according to Simpson.

"We went up there with a defeatist attitude," he said. "We had already Minorities still job hunting

Baseball's shift toward diversity not met by teams

The Associated Press

Baseball is an equal opportunity employer, unless the employee wants to be a big league manager.

The game's bold new stance on establishing a minority presence in major league dugouts took a blow Tuesday when two more managers were named. Buck Showalter of the New York Yankees and Bill Plummer of the Seattle Mariners have two things in common — neither has prior major league managerial experience and both are white.

The advice from the establishment has been for blacks to go out and learn the craft before going after big league openings. Yankee general manager Gene Michael said he talked to Milwaukee Brewers coach Don Baylor and Bill Robinson, a former New York Mets first base coach now broadcasting for ESPN.

"The fact they hadn't managed in the minor leagues got us back to in-house thinking," Michael said.

Showalter and Plummer both managed in the minors. Chris Chambliss was manager of the year in the Southern League this season. The Major League Baseball is trying to establish a minority presence in the game, but only one of 13 managerial vacancies has been filled by a black man. Here are some other candidates:

Don Baylor
Chris Chambliss
Bill Robinson

Yankees have permission from the Atlanta Braves to talk with him, but if he returns, it would probably be as a first base coach.

In a year in which 13 managers have been fired and one resigned, only one replacement — Kansas City Royals' Hal McRae — has been black. Baylor is frequently mentioned for openings, but so far he has not been hired. No blacks have been mentioned for the other two remaining openings in Chicago.

Commissioner Fay Vincent spoke out a number of times during the World Series about his concerns over minority hiring. "I've got to talk with Bill White and Bobby Brown and look at the whole situation when all the hiring is completed," Vincent said Tuesday. "It's a real concern."

"Part of the problem is we need more candidates. A lot of the focus is at the major league level, too. I've got to get more focus there. But without major league opportunities, it's difficult to do. It's circular. It's a subject people should focus on and I've got to do more work to find out what's taking place."

Vincent had hoped the expansion franchises in Colorado and Florida would lead the way and after he spoke out, the Marlins named Cookie Rojas, a Latin, to their scouting staff.

Richard Lapchick, executive director of the Center for the Study of Sport in Society at Northeastern University, is encouraged by Vincent's stand.

"The campaign is relatively new," Lapchick said. "Vincent spoke out only recently. It takes a long time for that to filter down to the club level. He has more leverage with expansion teams."

"I was happy to see him speak out. I was encouraged by that and that's coming from someone who has been a strong critic of baseball."

Lapchick said the appointment of one white after another to managerial posts is disturbing but not surprising.

Smith admits error cost Braves a run

Running blunder helped Twins rally to win Series

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Lonnie Smith, whose baserunning mistake in the seventh inning may have cost his Atlanta Braves a run — and possibly the World Series — admits he was faked out by the Minnesota Twins' infield.

Smith refused to talk to the media immediately after Sunday night's 1-0, 10-inning loss to the Minnesota Twins. But he told a Philadelphia Inquirer columnist it was "my mistake" when he failed to score from first on Terry Pendleton's long eighth-inning double.

"On the ball Terry hit, if I'd taken the time to take one look, that could have been the difference," Smith told the Inquirer. "... Evidently, they all seem to think if I had picked the ball up ...

"It happened. My mistake."

Smith, who was running on the pitch, said he didn't look toward the plate as Pendleton swung, but he saw second baseman Chuck Knoblauch appear to field a grounder and throw to shortstop

Atlanta's Cox wins NL honor

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bobby Cox became the first to win manager of the year in both leagues when he was voted National League Manager of the Year on Tuesday by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Cox, the 1985 American League Manager of the Year with the Toronto Blue Jays, led the Braves to their first pennant since moving to Atlanta to Milwaukee in 1966.

Atlanta, the worst team in baseball in 1990 at 65-97, finished 94-68 this year and won the NL West title for the first time since 1982. The Braves, along with the Minnesota Twins, became the first major league team this century to go from last to first.

The Braves beat the Los Angeles Dodgers by one game to win the division, beat the Pittsburgh Pirates in seven games in the NL playoffs, then lost to Minnesota in seven games in the World Series.

"It was just a great year to manage with this ball club," said Cox, who began his second stint as Atlanta manager during the 1990 season. "I'm a very lucky guy."

Cox got 13 first-place votes, 10 seconds and one third for 96 points, easily beating Pittsburgh manager Jim Leyland, who got 74 points. Leyland received nine votes for first, seven for second and eight for third.

Joe Torre of the St. Louis Cardinals was third with 41 points, getting two first-place votes, seven seconds and 10 thirds. Tommy Lasorda of the Dodgers got five third-place votes and finished fourth.

"I don't take this honor lightly," Cox said. "You also don't get to achieve something like this without good players and staff."

Two weeks ago, Cox was selected as the Associated Press major league manager of the year.

"I feel great about this," Cox said. "But going into a season, as well as going out, these are things you really don't think about until it happens."

He began his major league managing career with the Braves from 1978-81 and managed the Toronto Blue Jays from 1982-85, winning the AL East in 1985.

He returned to the Braves as general manager late in 1985 and took over as manager, too, when he fired Russ Nixon on June 22, 1990. Atlanta was 40-57 under Cox and finished last for the third consecutive year.

Cox, 50, relinquished his role as general manager to John Schuerholz after the 1990 season.

Greg Gagne.

It was all a fake — the ball was sailing toward the left-center wall. Smith stopped after rounding second, then realized where the ball was and resumed running. But the delay forced him to stop at third.

"Evidently, what nobody realizes, I was going with the pitch on a delayed steal," Smith said. "I got about halfway and I heard the sound of the bat. I made the mistake of not looking in when I started running. I just assumed that the ball would be hit on the ground."

In fact, left fielder Dan Gladden and center fielder Kirby Puckett were sprinting desperately toward Pendleton's long drive.

"Before I had a chance to look back, I saw the two infielders trying to glove something," Smith said.

"Then I looked up and I happened to see Gladden running toward the outfield (fence), and I saw Kirby, and then I noticed the ball almost as it hit, and after I saw they weren't going to catch it, I started running as hard as I could," Smith told the newspaper.

"You know, if I saw the ball off the bat, there's a good chance I could have scored. But I didn't see it. I didn't take that look in."

KU to sign another Davis

LAWRENCE (AP) — Chris Davis, a 6-foot-7 forward who is rated as one of the top basketball recruits in the nation, reportedly has decided to attend KU.

His coach, Steve Smith of Oak Hill Academy in Mount of Wilson, Va., said Davis informed KU coach Roy Williams about his decision over the weekend.

Smith said Davis will sign with KU during the early signing period from Nov. 13-20.

World Series puts CBS on top

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — The seventh game of the World Series got a 32.2 rating and a 49 share, making it the second-highest rated television broadcast of the year behind the Super Bowl.

CBS estimated Tuesday that the game was watched by 89.5 million people, the highest audience for baseball since the 1986 World Series.

The only TV broadcast this year with a higher viewership was the New York Giants' Super Bowl victory over Buffalo, which was televised by ABC and watched by 112.1 million people.

Minnesota's seven-game World Series victory over Atlanta finished with a 24.0 rating — the highest since 1987 — and a 39 share. The Twins and St. Louis Cardinals played a seven-game Series in 1987 and also got a 24.0 rating.

Sunday's seventh game, won by Minnesota 1-0 in 10 innings, got a 32.2 rating and a 49 share. Saturday's sixth game, won by the Twins in 11 innings, got a 25.4 rating and a 44 share. The rating was the highest for a CBS program on a Saturday night since January 1982.

The top five television shows last week were World Series games.

Workshop to aid graduates

Job Search 2000 helps students find best career options

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

In response to the growing concern about the limits of the job market, students are learning how to look for a job effectively.

Students need every competitive advantage to get the job they want after graduation, said Peter Grassl, president of Bowman & Marshall, which recruits executives and financial professionals for companies across the United States.

Grassl will be at K-State Nov. 2 to conduct Job Search 2000, a training program for students close to graduation.

Tom Irish of Performance Systems, a human resource consulting firm, will be Grassl's partner in the workshop.

"We've been receiving an unusually high number of calls from friends and acquaintances looking for ideas to help their sons and daughters secure jobs in today's market," Irish said.

The currently depressed economy makes finding meaningful jobs more challenging than ever, he said.

Participants in Job Search 2000 receive workbooks after registering by mail. They complete the workbooks and return them to Grassl and Irish along with their resumes.

The workbooks, resumes and personalized critiques will be returned to participants at the workshop.

"Participants will have created resumes that focus on successes and achievements rather than tasks and activities," Irish said. "They will be prepared to handle the toughest interviews."

Grassl said the Job Search 2000 method, combined with good use of the campus placement office, should ensure the best career opportunities.

The workshop is supported by the director of K-State's Career Planning and Placement Center, James Akin. It is designed to complement the center's services.

"It is important to use every possible resource that you can when looking for a job," Akin said.

Akin's support of the workshop is based on his knowledge of Irish, who has recruited on the K-State campus in the past.

"We're hoping this workshop will be a resource we can tap into in the future," he said.

Participants will have completed the basis of a job search network that will lead them to job opportunities not always available through traditional channels, Irish said.

He said he believes a student's first job is critical to future success.

"Job Search 2000 participants will learn how to present themselves to potential employers as the best and the brightest, giving them a competitive edge," he said.

The workshop will be from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. Saturday at the Ramada Inn.

given in to defeat and didn't try as hard as we could have."

After K-State's showing in the second half last season against the Sooners - the Cats limited OU to seven second-half points and one touchdown - the defense is much more confident going into this weekend's game.

"For one half, we played nose to nose with them," Simpson said. "We didn't let them intimidate us. And now we know they're not this great team. They're just another team."

After two close losses to top-ranked teams, the fear of a mental letdown is the farthest thing from Snyder's mind.

"I've said that each and every game the past three weeks is emotionally draining," Snyder said. "We were in a position where we controlled the outcome of each and every game."

Questions & Answers

Essential Edge Campus Campaign

What will my gift be used for?

You can designate exactly where you want your gift to go. This could be your college, a department within the college or a specific program in the department. You decide if your gift provides equipment, purchase journals or fund scholarships.

The Essential Edge Campaign benefits the entire campus, and you may wish to contribute to campus-wide programs like Friends of the Library, or the Multicultural Education Fund.

Gifts can support interdisciplinary programs such as Women's Studies, Latin American Studies, International Programs, or American Ethnic Studies.

The Foundation manages more than 2,000 accounts for the University's benefit. But, if a fund does not exist for the program you select, one will be created. Call Kirk Baughan at the Essential Edge office for additional details.

How much of the money I contribute actually goes to the fund I designate?

There are two types of funds: endowed funds, which require a minimum $5,000 contribution (but can be funded over several years and/or by several contributors), and expendable funds. Endowed funds return 5% of the market value of the principal annually. Total return above the 5% is added to the principal value to increase the endowment and offset inflation. Expendable funds go straight to the designated program less a minimal handling fee.

May I contribute through payroll deduction?

Yes. There is a form in your packet. The minimum contribution is $5 per month. About one-third of the faculty/staff contributions received have used payroll deduction. On your pledge card, please indicate the programs or projects to be supported by your gifts.

When should I make my pledge?

The public announcement of the Campus Campaign total is planned for early December. Pledges received by November 30 will be included in that report. A pledge is an important decision, however, and we want to allow contributors time to consider Campaign gifts.

What is the timetable of the Essential Edge Campaign?

The Campaign began July 1, 1988, and will end June 30, 1993. The Campus Campaign is the fourth phase, and next year we will contact all alumni.

I understand cash gifts are preferred, but what other options are available?

There are several options for gifts to the Essential Edge Campaign. Among these are charitable trusts and charitable annuities. Call the Essential Edge office for additional details.

Rittenhouse's solution to combating and preventing satanism and occult activity is immersion in Christianity and developing a relationship with God through Jesus Christ.

More than 20 people lined up to take the microphones during a question and answer session after the lecture.

Some asked questions, which Rittenhouse answered, but others, including one professed Wiccan, expounded on their own beliefs.

Wicca is the name for a religion some describe as witchcraft.

At several points people at the mikes were cut off and audience members shouted out in their defense or in the defense of Rittenhouse who said the session was for questions only. Some shouted questions and remarks anonymously from the floor or the balcony.

Though, as one student asking a question remarked, the crowd was basically on Rittenhouse's side, many scoffed and fidgeted quietly in their seats.

"I have total respect for everything he said. And, most of what he said is not in conflict with what I already hold to be true," said P.J. Arroyo, junior in psychology.

Arroyo said his fear was that Rittenhouse was frightening parents into contributing to just what they are trying to stop — deviant behavior. He said if children listen to lyrics and, for instance, draw satanic pictures, the parent will get concerned and go to the child showing concern.

This, he said, is exactly what they are looking for — attention. He said he agreed the behavior is a cry for help, but he said it was just that, not evil or dangerous, that the murderers Rittenhouse talked about were psychologically disturbed.

Greg Kice, junior undecided, said the speech was not something to be argued with.

to the Board of Regents for building projects until 1996.

"It's just on the schedule that way," he said.

The referendum will require a 60-percent vote in favor of the question to pass. It will appear on a ballot along with the proposed expansion of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex, but will be decided as a separate question.

"A lot of students will ask why they should contribute to a building of this sort," Hobrock said. "The correct answer to this question is that in the 1990s, the state is demanding a much larger contribution to these kinds of buildings."

Although most students will not be at K-State when the project is completed, Hobrock said they will be making an investment in the University.

"Students that came before today's students authorized and paid fees for things that benefit today's student," Hobrock said.

Bramlage, the Union and Holton Hall are just a few of the projects that Hobrock said were decided by students that did not see results until after leaving the University.

"People here are taking this fairly seriously, especially with the mass murders that have been in the news lately."

Herbert Kelman, a Harvard University psychologist, said the rumors may reflect students' worries about recent events, including the recent massacre in Killeen, Texas, and the murders of students at the University of Florida in Gainesville.

"Usually rumors of this kind aren't random," Kelman said. "They have something to do with some shared concerns, fears or hopes."

Broken Wings (Train d'enfer)
O Vertigo Danse
Saturday, November 2, 8 p.m.

Montreal's hottest choreographer, Ginette Laurin, has won over audiences and wowed critics with her fresh, dynamic approach; the almost acrobatic virtuosity of her strikingly individual dancers; and the theatricality of her original, entertaining performances.

Join her as she takes the seven members of O Vertigo Danse into a twilight-zone train station. Over these restless wanderers, angels appear and give rise to a dance that transforms the commonplace into a fantastic journey.

Wilder: it's time for a change

Economy anemic, government to blame, says candidate

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Today's American economy can be summed up in one word — anemic.

L. Douglas Wilder, Virginia governor and candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, said this is why drastic change is needed for a nation that is no better off than it was four years ago.

A crowd of more than 1,500 heard Wilder talk about issues ranging from the economy to education during the 90th Landon Lecture on Public Issues delivered Wednesday morning in McCain auditorium.

"Of course, many people and many of our elected leaders in Washington — from the White House to the Congress — try to blame the economy for today's limited opportunities," Wilder said. "But who is to blame for the state of the nation's economy?"

Wilder said the answer is in Washington, D.C.

"I'll give you a hint. A great many of them sit in the nation's capital passing pork-barrel legislation, ignoring or vetoing badly needed legislation and posing for pictures while imposing on our personal freedom at every turn," Wilder said.

He gave examples of the current economic state of the nation, citing the results of a New York consulting firm's new misery index that measures the portion of Americans' personal income that goes to taxes, personal interest payments and medical costs.

"That portion has grown steadily from just over 24 percent in 1960, to over 40 percent, with roughly half of the increase having taken place during the last ten years," he said. "Forty percent of personal income is eaten up in some form of taxes."

Wilder said Americans have a right to be angry when they discover how Washington has caused the economic situation.

He said although the United States has more economic resources than ever before, the government went broke in the last decade and is continuing to stay broke.

"But even more amazing — for a government that was supposedly broke during the '80s — it certainly knew how to spend," Wilder said.

This was caused by the willingness to go from being the greatest creditor nation in the world in 1980 to the greatest debtor nation in a decade and letting the savings and loan scandal be paid for by the middle class and future generations, he said.

Wilder went on to describe more of what the government has done to make the economy grow steadily worse.

"For my own part, I fervently believe that the taproot of America's decline can be found in the selfishness, insensitivity and utter lack of vision that has grown steadily worse in Washington over the last ten years," he said.

Wilder also said one of the problems with the economy is that Japan has undertaken a coordinated trade war with American industries and is targeting and removing them one by one.

To illustrate the irony of the situation, Wilder used the manufacturing of television sets in America today as an example.

Governor running for presidential nomination

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Virginia governor and candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, L. Douglas Wilder, said he is running for president instead of a seat in the Senate because his state does not have a Senate vacancy.

"There is a vacancy for the presidency," Wilder said.

In a news conference following Wednesday's Landon Lecture, Wilder was asked if he supported random drug testing for college students.

Wilder said a similar question was posed to him last year after a raid took place at the University of Virginia.

"My answer is to the extent that constitutional guidelines would not be crossed," he said. "I would look at it."

Wilder said it was decided not to perform drug testing, and a proposed ban of alcohol on campus was also dropped.

"I'm concerned with having a dual-standard or a double standard," he said, "that you can have drugs on campus and use them rather promiscuously. But if you go out on the streets, you'll be arrested."

Wilder was also questioned about Mario Cuomo's possibility of running.

"I think if Mario Cuomo got in (the presidential race), it would help," he said, "because it would put a clear, definitive record of accountability into play."

Wilder said he would put his record up against anyone else in office, Wilder said.

"I think the Mario Cuomo thing is more media than anything else," he said. "I don't find the people in Kansas or in Illinois or in New Hampshire saying 'Give us Mario.' I don't find it in New York, where he lives. I don't find it anywhere (except in the media)."

Wilder was asked why he announced his candidacy so early.

"Some said it was late," Wilder said. "Four years ago, you had seven Conference negotiating territorial accord

By the Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — For the first time in more than four decades of bloodletting, Israel and all its Arab foes sat down together, listening warily Wednesday as President Bush urged them to forge a territorial compromise.

■ Stories, PAGE 10.

Bush and President Mikhail Gorbachev opened the historic Middle East peace conference in Madrid's ornate Royal Palace, then left centerstage to the participants.

The opening session was marked by a hard-line speech from Egypt's foreign minister, who called for full Israeli withdrawal from the occupied lands.

The conference began against the backdrop of threats of more violence in the Middle East. In Lebanon, thousands of Islamic protesters demonstrated against the talks, chanting "Death to America, Death to Israel!" In Iran, a hardliner said all conference delegates should be killed.

"Peace will only come as a result of direct negotiations," President Bush told the delegates at the opening session, calling for territorial compromise as a means of finding peace.

"It would be unforgivable to miss this opportunity," Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev told the assembled delegates.

U.S., Israeli and Arab officials acknowledged deep uncertainty

Federal Reserve drops banking interest rate

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve, following fresh signs of distress in the U.S. economy, let a key interest rate fall on Wednesday in what many economists interpreted as a signal the central bank had embarked on a new round of credit easing.

The Fed allowed the Federal Funds Rate, the interest that banks charge each other, to fall to 5 percent. Many analysts saw the development as a signal the central bank had pushed its target range for this rate down from its previous level of 5.25 percent in an effort to stimulate economic activity.

An easing move had been widely expected after the gloomy economic reports of recent days and comments

Monday by Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan that the economy was bucking "50-mile-an-hour head winds."

On Wednesday, the government reported that sales of new homes took their biggest nosedive in 2 1/2 years, plunging 12.9 percent in September to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 446,000. Every part of the country suffered double-digit declines.

Analysts said the drop in single-family home sales was ominous given

Campus offers Halloween stops

Children who enjoy trick or treating can have a fun and safe holiday tonight.

Several residence halls and greek houses are planning Halloween activities for Manhattan children.

Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity has organized its first Halloween community service project.

Damon Hininger, senior in sociology and coordinator of the event, said 11 sororities are helping the Pikes by opening up their houses for trick or treating.

"Each house decided on a different format," Hininger said. "We gave them three formats to choose from — a haunted house, a big room with ghost stories or rooms where they hand out treats," he said.

Hininger said they wanted to host trick or treaters to give them a safe atmosphere to have fun. He also said it was a way for the greek houses to give something back to the community.

"The houses on campus often don't do anything for the residents of Manhattan, and this is kind of a payback for letting us use their community," he said.

Hininger said the Pikes sent out 3,600 fliers to area elementary schools. All children are welcome.

Parents who would like more information may contact the Pike house, he said.

The residence halls have also planned activities for area children. Ford, West, Moore, Goodnow, Boyd and Putnam halls are all opening up for trick or treaters.

Darcee Hemman, sophomore in pre-physical therapy and special events coordinator for Ford Hall, said the hall will be open from 6-9 p.m. Escorts will be in the lobby to take the kids up to whatever floor they want.

"We're trying to provide an area where kids can trick or treat safely and not run into bad lighting or bad treats," she said. "Last year we weren't very organized, and kids just roamed

TV assembly line heads for the border

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., (AP) - Some of the more than 1,000 workers who will lose their jobs at the Zenith Electronics Corp. plant expressed bitterness Wednesday over the shutdown of the last television assembly line in the country.

City officials, meanwhile, tried to put the best face on what could be a $400 million yearly loss to the local economy.

Employees who learned Tuesday that Zenith would move three-fourths of its local operation to Mexico next year emerged grim-faced from the meeting with union officials. Some were in tears.

The Zenith decision strikes a heavy blow to the city's economy, but leaders said its effect will not be devastating.

The announcement had been anticipated. Zenith, which will continue to make picture tubes and other components in the United States, was the last holdout in a consumer electronics industry that has fled to foreign countries to cut costs.

Union officials said in Mexican plants, top worker wages reportedly are $1.62 an hour. Springfield employees earn $11.27 an hour with benefits.

Lawyers claim skivies will clear Smith

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., (AP) — A judge ruled Wednesday that William Kennedy Smith's attorneys can use as evidence his accuser's dress and undergarments, which they claim will prove his innocence.

The condition of the clothing, particularly the bra, will disprove the 30-year-old woman's claim that Smith raped her on the grounds of his family's estate, lead attorney Roy Black said.

The woman told police that Smith, a 31-year-old nephew of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., tackled her and used his chest to pin her down while pulling up her dress.

"The lack of damage to these items clearly proves Mr. Smith's innocence," Black said, before Circuit Judge Mary Lupo denied a state motion to restrict use of the woman's clothing.

Lead prosecutor Moira Lasch urged the judge to not allow testimony and evidence she said the defense wanted to use to raise questions about the woman's morals.

Retirees give Duke warm welcome

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) - Hundreds of retirees cheered gubernatorial candidate David Duke Wednesday when he attacked welfare as a subsidy for criminals.

His opponent, former Gov. Edwin Edwards, was shouted down when he defended welfare for the unfortunate.

Duke's reception may be evidence the Republican is overcoming the stigma of his past ties to the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazis. The crowd was unusually hostile to Edwards, a Democrat once regarded as the state's most popular politician since Huey Long.

Both men spoke at a forum attended by about 700 people as part of the American Association of Retired Persons' state convention. The two led a field of 12 in an Oct. 19 primary and face each other in a Nov. 16 runoff.

Duke told the cheering crowd that the welfare system encourages women without husbands to have babies.

He also said the state should test welfare recipients and stop payments to those who use drugs.

Guns and gangs prompt football forfeit

LOS ANGELES (AP) - Athletes and officials at a suburban high school are forfeiting a football game rather than take on an inner-city rival at a stadium where they say gang violence makes it too dangerous to play or watch.

On Monday, a 16-year-old student was shot as he stood on a sidewalk outside city-run Jackie Robinson Stadium, the playing field of adjacent Dorsey High School in the midcity section.

And on Oct. 4, two students in the stands were wounded in gang crossfire during the final minutes of a game.

The Los Angeles Unified School District "took extraordinary measures to ensure that this would be a football game and no more," said its athletic director, Hal Harkness.

The principal of Banning High School in the southern suburb of Wilmington decided Tuesday to forfeit Friday's game and risk the team's No. 1 status after he met with athletes, fans, parents and staff.

The Friday night game was rescheduled for the afternoon, and police protection was arranged with police Chief Daryl Gates, Harkness said. But Banning High wanted the game played at a neutral site.

The schools are the two leading teams in the California Interscholastic Federation City Section, and the forfeiture could cost Banning its No. 1 ranking and a chance at the league championship.

Two federation committees will meet Nov. 7 to consider sanctions against Banning High.

Monday's shooting, which police said also appeared to be gang-related, occurred when the stadium was not in use.

FRED

Dear K-State Student,

As student body president, I want to make students the most important issue. My experiences here on campus have helped me get in touch with the students and in identifying their concerns.

During the past three years, I have worked with other students to raise the awareness of Farrell Library's conditions and in initiating the Campus Safety Task Force that led to the increased lighting on campus. These issues were important to students, and as student body president, I will continue to hear your concerns and act on them.

I want to lead Kansas State in the right direction. We must send a strong message to Topeka that higher education needs to be a priority in Kansas again. In addition, I am for an academic minors program and a campus shuttle system.

Again, as student body president, I want to make students the issue.

Thanks for taking the time to read this letter. If you have any questions or an idea for a better K-State, please call me at 539-3934. I would appreciate your vote on November 5 and 6.

Sincerely,

Fred

Fijis tell of ghost named Duncan

Weird encounters have been reported by fraternity members

HOLLY ZABEL
A&E Writer

Picture, if you will, a town. A small quaint university town, where everyone is a friendly neighbor. A town with quaint little houses that look as though they came right from Good Housekeeping magazine. To anyone else, this town may seem totally innocent. To those who know better, Manhattan is a town of ghostly ghosts.

The Fijis have a ghost. Before 1968, what is now the Phi Gamma Delta house used to be a Theta Xi house. It was the Theta Xis who supposedly killed a young man during hazing. The young man is now known as the ghost named Duncan.

There are two stories of how Duncan died, but both of them involve a Theta Xi initiation ceremony. The first story is that the pledges were being paddled. When it was Duncan's turn, he bent over to be paddled. After the first spanking he felt the pain, raised up and was smacked in the head with the paddle. Duncan died instantly.

The second version of the story tells how Duncan died of a heart attack. During his initiation, he was being forced into a coffin. Duncan became so frightened he had a heart attack and died.

Many of the Fijis say they tend to believe the paddle story more. When the paddle that killed Duncan was removed from its place of remembrance on what is now the house's library wall, the red paint underneath remained no matter how often it was painted over.

Finally, having tried with no success of covering the shape of Duncan's paddle on the wall, the Fijis put up wood paneling around the library to cover Duncan's paddle image.

Some Fijis have had encounters with Duncan's ghost. Terry Guiltner, year and major unknown, said he was in the sleeping dorms at about 3 a.m. and heard quiet footsteps making their way up the stairs. The footsteps walked down the hall way toward the sleeping dorms.

"There was a light in the hallway from a window down the hall, and so I was watching to see who it was," Guiltner said. "I heard the footsteps go right through the light, but I didn't see anything."

Guiltner said also that night, he heard someone lay down on the bottom bunk underneath him, but in the morning he noticed there was no mattress on that bed, just the frame and the springs.

David Bennett, junior in business administration, said Duncan hasn't been around much lately and that he has been heard less and less.

"Duncan likes pledges, he won't harm them, probably because he was a pledge," Bennett said. "Once, though, me and another pledge heard a small knock on the door, and when we opened it there was no one there."

Duncan is not only a ghost of the night. Andy MacHart, sophomore in business administration, didn't believe the ghost stories about Duncan until he heard Duncan one afternoon when MacHart was going to get his alarm clock from the sleeping dorm.

"I was going upstairs to the racks (sleeping dorms) to get my alarm clock," MacHart said. "When I was halfway up the stairs, the railing started shaking and shaking and then I heard footsteps like someone pounding up the stairs really fast. I didn't get my alarm clock, and I don't sleep there anymore. It was an eerie feeling."

The sleeping dorms, according to Chris Hupe, junior in business administration, is where Duncan was supposedly killed. During Thanksgiving break two years ago, Hupe and another Fiji were the only two at the house. Hupe said even though they were the only two there, the sleeping dorm door opened and then closed.

Hupe checked it out to see if anyone else was in the house, but nobody was. No one was in the sleeping dorm. Hupe thinks it may have been Duncan.

An older brother of the Fijis who graduated in 1989, Tom Dontel, had an encounter with Duncan also. Fiji John Foust, senior in hotel and restaurant management, tells Dontel's story.

"It was about 5 a.m., and Tom went to the bathroom," Foust said. "When he opened the door, he hit someone, so he said, 'excuse me,' and turned on the light. There was no one there. Tom didn't sleep here after that and still won't sleep here."

In 1976, the Fijis performed a seance in the sleeping dorm. Supposedly, one of the members started yelling and screaming and his fingertips turned green. They say Duncan was possessing the guy. A seance hasn't been performed there since.

around. This year it'll be much better."

Goodnow Hall has planned something different this year instead of the usual lobby decorating done on each floor, said Michele Moritz, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management and Goodnow president.

She said they decorated the basement as a haunted house for the kids tour. After that, the kids are welcome to trick or treat on each floor, she said.

Boyd Hall is having a carnival with games and refreshments for children.

Laura Deckert, senior in history and Boyd Hall receptionist, said there will be nine games in the basement for the kids to play and win prizes. Boyd residents will not have room-to-room treats, she said.

Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department, said he supports what the the living groups are doing, calling them preventive measures.

"There's no major problem here in Manhattan, but it is an area of natural concern," he said.

He said one advantage is it encourages parents to come along and interact with their children.

ENGLISH

America: baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and English. This will be the definition of America if U.S. English, a Washington, D.C., political interest group, has its way. Members of this group think it is a violation of their civil rights to hear foreign languages, because it makes them feel like an outsider in their own country.

Because of this pig-headed attitude, U.S. English has persuaded legislatures in 18 states to pass English-only laws requiring English as the official language of the state. Declaring English as the official language of the United States isn't the problem — English is, and most likely always will be, the predominant language in this country. The dilemma exists in the attitude that foreign-speaking Americans violate everyone else's civil rights.

But this country belongs to all Americans, no matter what language they speak, and English-only laws compromise the Constitutional rights of every single person in America to speak freely.

This absurdity needs to stop. U.S. English advocates need to read the Constitution and refresh their memories as to what America is all about.

SPANISH

Estados Unidos: beisbol, perros calientes, pastel de manzana e inglés.

Así se definiría a los Estados Unidos si inglés en los Estados Unidos, un grupo con fines políticos localizado en Washington, D.C., se sale con las suyas.

Miembros de este grupo opinan que escuchar a personas hablando otras lenguas es una violación a sus derechos civiles, porque esto los hace sentir como extraños dentro de su propio país.

Debido a esta actitud obstinante, inglés en los Estados Unidos ha conseguido persuadir a legisladores en 18 estados a pasar leyes que establecen el inglés como el idioma oficial de dichos estados.

El declarar el inglés como el idioma oficial de los Estados Unidos no es el problema — inglés es, y probablemente seguirá siendo, el idioma predominante en este país. El dilema se debe a la argumentación de que ciudadanos estadounidenses que hablen otros idiomas violan los derechos civiles de los demás.

Pero este país pertenece a todos sus ciudadanos, sin importar el idioma que hablen, y legalizar el inglés como el idioma oficial pone en peligro los derechos constitucionales de cada individuo a expresarse libremente en los Estados Unidos.

Hay que detener este absurdo los defensores de inglés en los Estados Unidos necesitan leer la constitución y refrescar en su memoria el significado de los Estados Unidos.

SHANNON HEIM
OPINION PAGE EDITOR

A member of the Editorial Board came to the meeting last week fired up about something she had just read.

"We've got to write an editorial about this," she said. "It's just ridiculous. These people don't want to let anybody speak foreign languages in the United States. Can you believe that?"

Needless to say the rest of the Editorial Board members took notice. "What the heck are you talking about," we asked. "They can't do that."

And so the discussion began. First, we just agreed it was worth bringing to the public's attention that a group calling themselves U.S. English was striving to make English the official language of the United States, state by state. And, already 18 states had written it into their constitutions.

But, as we tried to determine what reasoning U.S. English members could possibly use to persuade these states' officials, we began to discuss something much more important.

It doesn't really matter if it's written down somewhere that English is the official language of the United States. Heck, the Meadowlark is the Kansas state bird and Blue Jays, crows, robins and pheasant still fill the sky. So making something official doesn't have to mean outlawing something else.

The scary thing is the closed-mindedness of these people. They say they feel uncomfortable hearing other languages spoken on the streets of their homeland.

Then we realized that by printing the editorial in only English we might be undermining our stance. Wouldn't it be great to give everyone a chance to feel comfortable reading this editorial, because it was written in the language they most easily understand?

So, we wrote our editorial. Then we went to the International Student Center and asked if the editorial could be translated to the six most predominantly spoken foreign languages at K-State. And, thanks in a big way to the help of the ISC, here is that editorial translated in Mandarin Chinese, Spanish, Hindi, Arabic, Korean and Vietnamese.

Our point is simply to remind people of the diversity of the K-State campus, which only adds to the educational opportunities available.

We don't feel uncomfortable hearing the people next to us speak a foreign language. We think it's cool they chose to come to Kansas, and we hope they feel at home.

如果按照「美國英語」——華盛頓特區的一個政治團體——的定義，這就是美國的定義。

這個團體的成員認為，聽外國話是對他們公民權利的侵犯，因為這使他們感到在他們自己的國家像一個外來人。

出於這種偏執而愚蠢的態度，「美國英語」就限了十八個州的立法者們通過了「英語法」，要求以英語為州的官方語言。

宣佈英語為美國的官方語言並不存在甚麼問題——英語是，並且很可能永遠是這個國家的主要語言。問題在於認為操外語的美國人侵犯了其他人的公民權這種態度。

但是這個國家是屬於所有美國人的，不管他們講何種語言，而且「英語法」有悖於憲法所規定的在美國的每一個人都擁有語言的權利。

這種荒唐的行為必須停止。「美國英語」的提倡者們需要讀一讀憲法，需要更新一下他們頭腦中關於美國的定義。

Dracula thought of as folk hero; not evil

Historical vampire no less terrifying and cruel than modern Hollywood's version

Tales of the "nosferatu" or vampire are indigenous to most of the cultures of the world and pre-date recorded history.

The earliest legends were oral, recounted mysteriously around the flickering flames of an evening fire. The most famous stories have been handed down by the peoples living in the heart of the Carpathian Mountains and along the Danube River in southeastern Europe.

Vampires have figured in novels, short stories, poems and even in judicial records throughout the centuries. Many of the world's literary greats have contributed to the bacchanalia of blood, including Guy de Maupassant, H.G. Wells, Lord Byron, Charles Dickens, Edgar Allen Poe and most recently, Stephen King.

In 1897, Irish author and theater critic Bram Stoker published "Dracula," a book that was to revolutionize the arcana of vampire-lore. Stoker's notorious count inhabited Castle Dracula above the Borgo Pass in Transylvania during the final years of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Since inception, this white-fanged, black-caped, blood-drinking nobleman has captured the public's imagination. The persona of Dracula has usurped the very image of the vampire. Moreover, this image has obscured the historical Dracula, a figure no less terrifying and cruel than his Hollywood counterpart.

The fifteenth century life and times of the historical Dracula were tumultuous and desperate. The lands known today as Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia were a battleground between Eastern Europe and the Ottoman Empire. Vast armies ravaged the military frontier of Transylvania-Wallachia. Christian king and Moslem sultan vengefully played the various Balkan princes in their paths of conquest as pawns in a dirty diplomatic game. Plague visited the land with its skeletal grip, and human life was cheap.

In 1431, the king of Hungary made Vlad II "Prince of Wallachia" and awarded him the Order of the Dragon (Dracul). That same year, Vlad had a son whom history would know as Vlad III Tepes "the Impaler," or simply, Dracul(a), (Son of the Dragon).

Dracula would know no normal childhood or adolescence. His father was assassinated by rival political factions and his eldest brother, Mircea, was tortured then buried alive. Dracula and his brother, Radu, were held hostage by the Turks for several years during which Radu was forced into a sexual relationship with the sultan. Years later, Dracula's wife jumped into the thousand-foot gorge below their castle walls rather than be captured by enemies in Turkish pay.

The effect of these events on Vlad III Dracula's personality do not have to be imagined. In 1456, he invited the Wallachian nobility who had betrayed his family to a feast, then had them impaled by the hundreds.

Impalement involved the "spitting" of a human being on a tall stake then literally hanging the person "up to dry." Three years later, during his Great Danubian Campaign, Vlad III impaled 23,884 Turkish soldiers in a virtual forest of blood.

Dracula also raided the wealthy German-Saxon communities of southern Transylvania. Thousands who refused to submit to one-sided economic arrangements were impaled in grisly, serried rows. In retaliation, the Germans used their new invention, the movable printing press, to churn out pamphlets defaming his character throughout Europe.

Literary defamation was not really necessary, however, for Dracula's depredations and evil actions were legion. Conveniently, the Rumanian word "dracul" is interchangeable with "devil." As if in fulfillment of the biblical prophecy that "he who lives by the sword dies by the sword," Vlad III was ambushed and beheaded outside Bucharest in 1476.

Shortly thereafter, rumors suggesting Dracula had been reborn as a vampire began to circulate. According Fraternity begins searches following police training

RUSSELL HENKE
Collegian Reporter

A campus patrol watch initiated by Kappa Sigma fraternity members that aims to deter potential campus crime will begin this week after training sessions with the K-State Police are completed.

Cory Hayes and Jim Purvis, juniors in theater, started the campus patrol to protect potential victims from rape, mugging, theft and other forms of crime. Last year, they also began an escort service that continues today.

The patrol provides additional support for the campus police.

"It's hard for campus police to cover the entire campus," Hayes said. "They are enthusiastic about our program and have given us 100 percent support."

The upcoming training session will involve both discussion pertaining to legal limitations on the patrol members and precautionary background checks.

Hayes said each potential patrolman will be screened by the campus police to guarantee no one volunteering has a criminal record or is potentially at risk for overstepping his bounds.

The patrol members will not intervene in any forceful manner, he said. They will just report any wrongdoings and try to prevent crime with their presences.

Patrol members will identify themselves by wearing white coats emblazoned with "Kappa Sigma Campus Patrol" while scanning the campus for potential problems.

"We are not cops," Hayes said. "We are there to offer an extra hand by deterring and reporting any problems."

Hayes said he does not want the campus patrol to be known as the Kappa Sigma police.

"We wouldn't mind incorporating another house or any other organization who wants to get involved," he said. "We just felt a program like this needed to be started."

Mary Anne Blum, sophomore in criminal justice and representative for Ford Hall, attended a campus patrol meeting on Oct. 27 at the Kappa Sig house. She said programs like the campus patrol and escort services benefit the campus by increasing safety.

Purvis said preventive measures such as walking in pairs greatly diminish the potential for crime.

"People who attack others usually look for people who are alone," he said.

Hayes said prevention and cooperation are the keys to the program.

"We need to do both, or the world will continue spiraling down the toilet," he said. "I love this campus, and I love this school. K-State is not the worst place as far as crime goes, but it is not the best."

After further review...

Nobody's perfect.

That theme reigns in our society today, and fittingly so, most would agree. It allows us underachievers to not feel so guilty about our average abilities.

But there are a chosen few that are exempt from that group of errorless individuals.

They are today's officials, referees and umpires.

Counted on each day to make no mistakes, the best in this profession are those who go unnoticed. Rather than come to the front, they blend in when the game is on the line.

Then there is the other 99 percent. (If you're still confused, this would be the category that the controversial Big Eight-Big Ten basketball official Jim Bain would fall under.)

All right. They have a very difficult job, and they are correct the majority of the time.

The overall point is that even the very best referees make occasional mistakes. But that's OK, nobody's perfect.

No, it's not OK. It interferes with our favorite pastimes, and that's just not acceptable.

Games are to be won or lost because of the interactions between the two teams. The team that executes throughout a contest should win.

That shouldn't be altered.

Instead, games are determined by the officials' perception of plays, whether right or wrong.

As the level of athletic ability has risen to a new height, the standards for those that mediate the game have not.

Considering that new level, especially in basketball, it is nearly impossible to accurately call a game on a consistent enough basis that would not significantly alter the outcome.

That's not necessarily an attack on basketball officials. It's just a reason to make some changes. The NCAA, college athletics governing body, has intervened for less valid reasons.

The biggest gripe with football obviously involves the replay booth. I am one of the biggest proponents of instant replay usage, but it has some gross flaws in its current structure.

If football is going to have instant replay, it should be allowed in all instances.

It's getting to the point that referees are having a hard time deciphering exactly under which situations reversals are possible.

The one time it should not be used is when a play is blown dead, which brings up another problem. Why can't officials stop the action when a play is blown dead? There is not one advantage for allowing play to continue during dead-ball situations.

Yet the clock continues to run and injuries are at a high risk, as some players react to the whistle and others continue to battle. This is especially true in cases like false starts and offsides, in which defenders gain an advantage by starting a play in the offense's backfield.

While on the subject of instant replay, why not use it in baseball?

You can't use the No. 1 argument that football has with it, which is that it delays the game. In no way would instant replay slow the pace of baseball.

If you argue that there just aren't enough times that it would be needed, you obviously haven't watched the umpires feeble attempts to get even one tag play correct.

Denny Trease of the Royals' broadcasting team has referred to it as the phantom tag.

The runner is out if the baseman catches the ball before the runner touches the base and tags the air anywhere within ten feet.

Replays just might decrease the number of 10-minute arguments between umpires and coaches. Boy, that would hurt the game.

As if correct calls wouldn't do athletics enough damage.

Playing 12 matches in just nine days was a bit too much, even for someone who loves her sport.

That 12-match run was faced recently by Karin Lusnic, a first-year member of the K-State tennis squad.

She was eliminated from last week's Riviera All-American Tennis Championships by Rebecca Jensen in two sets, 6-3, 6-2.

With her seven previous wins and her appearance in the main draw of the Riviera tournament, Lusnic had already contributed to the K-State tennis program the most noteworthy individual success attained by a Wildcat netter in 14 years.

K-State coach Steve Bietau said the consistency that Lusnic showed while on the court was remarkable.

"I think the biggest thing (that led to) her success was the fact that she was able to play so well so long against a high level of competition," he said.

"We certainly expected her to get some wins. But knowing that endurance is a factor, knowing that if she advances through the draws she would play better players who are rested, her results are a big success."

Lusnic was also pleased with her performance.

"I think I played really well," she said. "But it was a busy week. I played 12 matches, nine singles and three doubles (with teammate Mareke Plocher), and with each match it got tougher.

"I got more and more tired. I was dead tired in the last match. I couldn't think, I couldn't move anymore. It was just not me anymore on the court."

Still, Lusnic and Bietau considered the performance a huge success. It was even more remarkable when you consider that hardcourts are not Lusnic's favorite surfaces.

"At home in Lubijana (Yugoslavia), I always played on clay courts," Lusnic said. "I never played on hardcourts before I came to K-State."

"It was very difficult for me in the beginning, because the game is totally different on a hardcourt. It is much faster and your service is more important. But the more I play on it, the better I get."

Bietau said Lusnic's net play needs improvement, but otherwise she has strong basic skills.

"Karin moves around the court as well as any other player," Bietau said. "She's got exceptional movement, she has strong ground strokes and knows when to change the pace of the ball."

"And she is really strong mentally. She is capable of lifting her game in important moments in the match and against better players. She knows what she has to do, what she is doing wrong. We don't need to tell her, she already knows."

Lusnic said her mental strength results from playing many tournaments back in Europe.

"If you play a lot of matches, that really helps you," Lusnic said. "And with a strong mind you can beat players. I think 50 percent of the game is played in your mind, because the girls are equal at that (All-American Championships) level."

Lusnic played in tournaments in Switzerland and Yugoslavia before coming to K-State. Previous to that, Lusnic had a stint on the professional tour in Europe, a stint she found very tough.

Still, Lusnic at one time had the chance to play against the world's best player, Monica Seles.

"It was about seven years ago when I played doubles against her in Yugoslavia," she said. "But we lost."

She also had the chance to practice with German Anke Huber, at one point No. 13 in the world, because Lusnic's coach in Yugoslavia is the son of Huber's coach, Boris Breslav.

At the tournaments in Switzerland, Lusnic met K-State's Michele Riniker, who told her about college tennis in the United States and specifically at K-State.

Lusnic said Riniker helped her a lot, but she also talked to other players who were playing in the U.S.

"They all told me how nice it is to play here and that school is easy in comparison with Europe," Lusnic said. "But the main reason for me to come to K-State was the fact I could combine school with tennis."

"In Yugoslavia, it is impossible to do both. We don't have colleges like these in Yugoslavia. You're doing just school or just sports."

Overall, it was a difficult decision for Lusnic to come to K-State because she didn't know what it actually would be like. But then she took the big step.

"I decided really late to come to K-State," she said. "It was about March this year. The problem was then to get a visa. Because of the political situa-

Kelly selected as top AL skipper

By the Associated Press

Tom Kelly, whose Minnesota Twins became the only club in baseball history to go from last place one year to World Series winners the next, was named American League Manager of the Year on Wednesday.

Kelly guided the Twins to a seven-game victory over the Atlanta Braves for his second World Series title in five seasons. The Twins also won baseball's championship in 1987, Kelly's first season.

The Twins were 74-88 in 1990, last in the AL West. At Kelly's urging, they pursued free agents Jack Morris, Mike Pagliarulo and Chili Davis and, after a 2-9 start that led to speculation Kelly would be fired, had the majors' best record over the last 151 games to finish 95-67.

Kelly received 27 of a possible 28 first-place votes in balloting by the Baseball Writers Association of America and finished with 138 points. Detroit Tigers' manager Sparky Anderson, who received the other first-place vote, was second with 50 points and Toronto Blue Jays' Cito Gaston was third with 17.

Jim Lefebvre, Joe Morgan and Stump Merrill, all fired, were among a record 10 managers to receive votes. Lefebvre and Morgan tied for fourth with 16 points.

Voting is done by two baseball reporters from each AL city.

Minnesota defeated the Blue Jays in five games in the AL playoffs before beating the Braves, who went from last to first in the NL. On Tuesday, Atlanta's Bobby Cox was named the NL's top manager by the BBWAA.

Kelly said 1991 was more satisfying than 1987 because he was allowed to have more say about the club's makeup.

When he was hired as interim manager for the fired Ray Miller at the end of the 1986 season and was promoted to manager before 1987, Kelly was the majors' youngest skipper at 36.

His 1987 club finished 85-77 and stunned the baseball world by beating the St. Louis Cardinals in the World Series.

Brewers look to future, choose unproven GarnerNew GM Bando goes with ex-mate

By the Associated Press

MILWAUKEE — Phil Garner became the newest member of baseball's growing army of young managers Wednesday. He was hired by the Milwaukee Brewers despite no previous managerial experience in the big leagues.

"Today it's no different than signing a player out of high school or college. You're looking at the potential of what he's going to be. And I see the same correlation with Phil and all the managers betting on his abilities in the future," said Brewers general manager Sal Bando, a former Oakland A's teammate of Garner.

Garner became the fourth former player in a month to be hired without any previous major-league managerial experience. He joins Boston's Butch Hobson, Buck Showalter of the New York Yankees and Seattle's Bill Plummer.

"We put criteria together in what we were looking for, and managerial experience wasn't one of them. It would have been nice to have, but it wasn't at the top of our list," said Bando, who chose Garner over six other candidates.

"It had to do with the personality of the individual in feeling what was the best match. I felt he was the right man to take the club to the next level."

Garner, who earned the nickname "Scrap Iron" for his feisty play during the late '70s with the Pittsburgh Pirates, said he'd always aspired to be a manager but not this quickly.

"I had not put out any feelers. I had not been seeking a job," he said.

Not only has Garner not managed in the majors, but he's never managed in the minors either. He has been a coach for only three years with the Houston Astros since retiring as a player in 1988.

And Garner hasn't been in the American League since 1976, which was his last season with the A's.

"I was interviewing this organization as much as he was interviewing me to see if I felt like I could accomplish what I expected to," said the 42-year-old Garner, who reportedly received a three-year contract.

"I think it's important that you need some time to implement what you want to do. You don't want to manage from one day to the next, and I think we solved that part of the problem."

Garner pledged aggressive baseball and a disciplined approach for a team that had its share of clubhouse outbursts in Tom Trebelhorn's final three seasons. Players complained about the way they were being used, and infielder Gary Sheffield criticized club officials.

"I can take charge," said Garner, adding that he hoped players would take their problems to him first. "I have a snapping point, and I suppose we all do. But people who know me closely know it's nothing personal."

"The object is to make sure we're all on the same wavelength - players, coaches and field personnel."

Hopeful house moms get trial run

K-State greek parents originate Colorado conference

JILL KIPPES
Collegian Reporter

Potential greek housemothers will have a unique opportunity this summer to learn what being a "mom" is all about.

Peggy Evans, Gamma Phi Beta housemother, and Betty Nichols, former Alpha Tau Omega housemother, thought of the idea in 1981.

Evans said, "We discovered this idea after discussing how being a housemother is a good way to get involved in business while loving college people and the greek system at the same time."

Nichols is now a housemother for Alpha Delta Pi at the University of Arizona, so the plans were put on hold with hope that someday this event could take place.

After hearing about a workshop at the University of Missouri for house directors, the two women decided to go on with their workshop as planned. The Missouri workshop is intended for house directors. Evans said she believes housemothers and house directors are not the same.

"Anyone can learn to run a business, but becoming a housemother is more than just running a business," she said. "Loving and caring for young people is our main objective. College students need that kind of support when they're far from home."

The workshop is more than just an idea, it's also business.

Evans asked Fred Rice, head of the Small Business Development Center in Calvin Hall, what he could do to help get the business on its feet. He assigned three students involved in the Small Business Institute to help Evans by meeting every week to set up bookkeeping records, suggest a logo and write a questionnaire to be mailed to 200 housemothers in the 16-state region. Of those returning the questionnaires, one person will receive a free trip to the workshop.

SBI links local small businesses to the resources and management expertise of the College of Business Administration.

Evans and Nichols said they chose Colorado Springs as the location because of the beauty, climate and benefits it has to offer. The Colorado Springs Radisson Hotel will be sponsoring the event, and an airline will offer reduced round-trip airfare.

The three-day workshop is targeted toward single women and current housemothers living in the 16-state region.

Evans and Nichols said the participants will learn the valuable ins and outs of the profession from successful, experienced housemothers and other professionals.

State budgets get the squeeze

Recession, federal programs take away education, highway dollars

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The recession and federal demands have squeezed state budgets so tightly that spending for education and highways is threatened despite a record tax increase, state officials said Tuesday.

"The bottom line is that 1992 is going to be a very difficult year for states — perhaps the most difficult in the last decade," the National Governors' Association and the National Association of State Budget Officers concluded in their semi-annual report on state finances.

The states have raised taxes by $25 billion and cut spending by more than $10 billion during the 1991-1992 two-year budget period that will end in most states next June 30. Nevertheless, the report said, "failure to achieve a reasonable national economic recovery during 1992 may result in a year of budget cutting that is more difficult than the year that just ended."

Federal expansion of eligibility for Medicaid — a state-federal health program for 25 million poor people — and court-ordered prison expansions have forced some states to scale back planned improvements in education, environment and highways.

Most disturbing to state officials has been the growth of Medicaid, which now takes 14 cents of every dollar spent by the states — second only to elementary and secondary education. Medicaid spending grew by more than 20 percent during the 1991 budget year and now eats up 34 percent of all federal aid received by the states.

"There is still not a clear containment policy in place for controlling costs" of Medicaid, Raymond Scheppach, executive director of the governors' association, said. "Getting a handle on costs will require" some type of national health-care program, he said. State spending for prison construction shot up by 19 percent and 14 percent in the same two-year period. Most money for the penal system comes from general state taxes.

Because governors are becoming increasingly reluctant to ask for tax increases, Scheppach said, the states are likely to cut more deeply into spending and perhaps impose new "user fees" for specific programs.

The governor's report and a companion survey by state budget officers reported:

Tax collections in 30 states fell below estimates on which their 1991 budgets had been based. Twenty-nine

Art symposium draws top illustrators

Conference chance for students to talk to artists one-on-one

KIMIS TIMOTHEADIS
Contributing Writer

Some of the biggest names in illustration will present "Image Makers: A Symposium for Illustrators" Oct. 31 through Nov. 2 at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome.

The program will be sponsored by the art department.

Marilyn Woodward, conference coordinator, said four illustrators and an artist's representative will present individual sessions and have panel discussions about their careers.

Judy Neis, artist's representative, will talk about how to get into the field, how to get a representative and how to put a portfolio together. Anyone can come to her presentation in Gallery Six at the Art Building.

"Students will have the opportunity to learn things from people who have worked in the field a long time and who have gained international recognition," Woodward said. "Anybody who is involved in graphic design or in illustration work would recognize these people as being very important in the field.

"People will also have the opportunity to talk to them and get to know them," she said.

One important aspect of the symposium, Woodward said, is informal

A Pumpkin's Nightmare

I'd been warned about this time of year. The wind picks up and cools down, the patch fills up with fallen leaves, darkness falls a little earlier — and the people come.

In loud, rumbling machines, these uninvited guests invade my home. The smaller ones squeal and scamper around, tromping through the patch like it was their own.

Pumpkins are nothing to them but ornamentation.

I watched them scout through the patch for the most voluptuous of us to take home and slice into decorations.

I paid for my vanity that day. Always so proud of my fullness, my rich color, I began to pray for my sides to suddenly collapse or my rind to brown.

No luck. They should give us more warning.

Two small, cold hands suddenly seized my stem and felt me for bruises. Why hadn't I been born a rutabaga or something?

Then the heist began, the awful ripping from my vines and my niche in the warm earth. I tried to scream: This is kidnapping! This is assault!

What a hideous time to discover I didn't have vocal cords. "Gosh, Daddy, this is fun!" screeched one of the urchins.

She was getting a lapful of guts when they scraped me out.

Once the extraction was complete, they heaved me into the back of their machine, which growled and lurched to life. Seems the driver'd had some witches' brew earlier — I was jostled, rolled and bounced around the back of this contraption for the whole ride.

I arrived dizzy and disoriented, so it took me a while to appreciate the fact that they left me in my natural habitat for the night — outside on the ground. This spurred my hopes that I would be a lucky one, the trophy of kinder, gentler Halloween revelers who only wanted to create an autumn scene with pumpkins that were whole, not disfigured.

But it was all a cruel fantasy, I realized as I awoke to the chilling, unmistakable whine of a knife being sharpened inside the house. Newspapers were spread ominously across the porch. A bucket stood ready to catch my innards.

I was doomed to a carving.

Those children who played so innocently the day before now approached me with a bloodthirsty gleam in their eyes. They carried me to the chopping block, where their father loomed larger than ever, holding a knife of illegal proportions. My seeds went weak.

I dropped clumsily to the newspapers, and he leaned in slowly. I tensed for the stab, but instead felt a ticklish sensation instead as he drew the face he wanted to carve out of me. The waiting was excruciating.

Then I heard it — the menacing "schwing!" of the knife getting a final sharpening scrape.

A bolt of hot pain shot through me as he plunged the blade in and sliced around the stem. I was being carved alive!

My tormentors laughed as they continued slicing triangles for facial features — hideous distortions of what they thought I should look like.

When they finished their slaughter, I was perched on the porch railing for all to see my disfigurement. I could feel the whole pumpkins on the block taunting me with their intact shapes, flaunting their safety. Oh, the humiliation!

There I sat for the next four days, exploited for some senseless tradition. Children visited the house and recoiled at my repulsive appearance. But I wanted to make my captors recoil instead.

At dusk on the fourth night, small, strange creatures began creeping about the neighborhood toting bags and buckets. They converged on each house in groups of three or four. As the doors opened, they burst with screams of "Trick or treat!"

I expected the doors to slam shut in fear, yet the creatures were rewarded with handfuls of candy. Hmm. Strange feeding ritual in this neighborhood.

It continued for about an hour, this begging for sweets. Soon larger people came along to gather up the tykes, shepherding them home with words like, "Don't eat it all at once," and "You didn't visit that house those students live in, did you?"

As a night chill set in, a sense of foreboding came over me. The street was too deserted. The sky was too black.

Presently, I heard some voices coming closer. For some reason, I didn't feel better to have the company.

Four lanky young teenaged boys were coming up the sidewalk, looking furtively about. Their hands had an orangish tint to them that unsettled me.

They strode nonchalantly toward the house across the street. As they got halfway up the drive, the boys broke into a run, heading for the porch — and its resident pumpkin. A whole pumpkin.

Before I knew it, they'd snagged it and raced back to the street. The pumpkin sailed over a parked car and into the street, striking with a glorious smash and spewing orange goo all over the pavement.

Sweet revenge! They'd never come after me, a shell of the formerly full pumpkin I had been.

But I should've learned not to get my hopes up.

The boys turned and smiled maniacally at me. I knew, guts or no guts, I was going to meet my fate on the asphalt, too.

But at least my captors and carvers were going to lose their ill-gotten trophy.

Mideast peace talks begin

Madrid

For the first time in more than four decades, Israel and all its Arab foes gathered to discuss the situation in their countries. President George Bush and President Mikhail Gorbachev opened the conference in Madrid. Bush reinforced the United States' policy of urging Israel to move out of the occupied land in a spirit of fairness to the Palestinians. Egypt called for Israel's full withdrawal from occupied lands. The Soviets are backing the U.S. in order to encourage attendance.

Threats of violence continue in the Middle East as peace talks are forged across the Mediterranean Sea. In Lebanon, thousands of protesters demonstrated against the talks, chanting "Death to America, Death to Israel!" Syria agreed to meet with Israel for the first time, but threatened to withdraw if the Israelis did not stop building Jewish settlements in the occupied lands and begin to withdraw. In Israeli-occupied territories, more than 50 people were injured in Palestinian faction battles.

Bush suggests formula

President urges patience as Madrid meetings begin

By the Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — President Bush revived his land-for-peace formula Wednesday at the opening of the Middle East peace conference.

ANALYSIS

Looking for a quick-fix agreement in what could be negotiations over many years, Bush also urged Israel and the Palestinians to experiment on a self-rule plan for the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Nothing agreed to now will prejudice permanent status negotiations," he told the two nervous parties.

Bush's obvious aim is to get a quick dividend for himself and his foreign policy, and also for Arabs and Israelis in the event a more comprehensive settlement of their 43-year dispute proves elusive.

On Tuesday, in a news conference with President Mikhail Gorbachev, Bush steadfastly refused to repeat the land-for-peace slogan.

That, Bush suggested, might inhibit the launching of face-to-face bargaining between Arabs and Israelis.

To prescribe land-for-peace is to unnerve Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and Syrian President Hafez Assad.

Shamir appears determined not to yield any of the land Israel retains from the 1967 Six-Day war. And Assad is unwilling to offer peace to Israel in exchange for the Golan Heights alone.

Determined not to upset the two key players at the outset, Bush fell back on vaguely worded 1967 and 1973 U.N. Security Council resolutions that are artfully ambiguous.

The United States went to such lengths to satisfy Assad that the invitations to the peace conference did not even propose peace treaties as a goal.

"We seek peace, real peace," Bush said on Wednesday. "And by real peace I mean treaties. Security. Diplomatic relations. Economic relations. Trade. Investment. Cultural Exchange. Even tourism."

Bush said, the goal "is not simply to end the state of war in the Middle East and replace it with a state of nonbelligerency. This is not enough; this would not last," he said.

Bush told Shamir directly that "territorial compromise is essential for peace. Boundaries should reflect the quality of both security and political arrangements."

Bush was exercising the calculated ambiguity that has marked Middle East diplomacy for a generation.

Bush did not recite the ritual land-for-peace formulation in precisely those words.

Baker said afterward that all elements of U.S. policy were not "necessarily, specifically" in Bush's speech. He said Arabs and Israelis are well aware of the U.S. position and emphasized that the two U.N. resolutions that serve as a basis for the current negotiations "embraced the principal of territory for peace."

Faisal Hussein, a prominent Palestinian who serves as adviser to the Palestinian-Jordanian delegation and a link to the Palestine Liberation Organization, said he accepted Baker's explanation.

for peace but ignored by Gorbachev. "Let's face the facts," said one Arab delegate, who spoke on the condition that he would not be further identified.

"The United States is running the show. The Soviet Union cannot even feed its people and asks the world for food. It will not have much of a role."

A Soviet analyst, interviewed before the peace conference, said it was naive to think that the Soviet Union could play a role similar to that of the United States in the Middle East.

In his opening remarks Wednesday, Gorbachev mentioned the Middle East generally, noting the aspirations of Palestinians, who historically have counted on Soviet support.

Talks

Asked if the dates and venues for these talks were set, Secretary of State James Baker said no.

The participants were seated at a T-shaped table designed so the foes would face each other at a slight angle rather than head-on.

No national flags were displayed. One Israeli delegate extended a hand to a Lebanese woman in the chamber but was spurned.

Palestinian delegate Erekat was clad in the black-and-white checkered headdress favored by Palestine Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat.

The PLO has been banned from the talks because Israel regards it as a terrorist organization. The organization was palpably present, with a monitoring delegation in town.

Jordan's prime minister acknowledged afterward it had made him tense to even be in the same room as the Israelis, let alone across the table from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

"It is not a dinner party," he said curtly.

Another first was the attendance of Syria, the most hard-line of Israel's neighbors. Syrian and Israeli negotiators have never met except to negotiate a military armistice in 1949.

Zohair Jannan, head of the foreign press department at the Syrian Foreign Ministry, told the Associated Press the Syrians would pull out of the talks if Israel does not stop building Jewish settlements in the occupied lands and begin to withdraw.

Governor

"People were camping out in New Hampshire for months at a time. I announced Sept. 13 and have had very limited exposure because I have said I wasn't going to resign from governor," he said.

Wilder also discussed the condition of the Democratic Party.

"Democrats for too long have been projected as the tax-and-spend party; the weak-on-defense party; soft-on-crime party and give-away-the-store-to-special-interest groups party," Wilder said.

On foreign policy, Wilder said he would be as experienced as any other presidential candidate with the exception of George Bush.

Wilder said his solution would be to surround himself with the best possible minds.

"I would say that I am as well-versed in foreign policy as the needs would require relative to the duties of a president," Wilder said.

He also said Bush was weak in domestic policy.

Students talk with administrator

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

Several students got surprise phone calls and invitations recently to visit with an administrator about what they would change at K-State.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he picks the students at random and invites them to a luncheon to share their opinions about the way K-State handles enrollment, recruitment, advisement and anything else they would like to talk about.

Bosco said he has the luncheons three or four times each fall semester to find out about concerns he may not otherwise hear from students.

"Many times, campus leaders are the only ones that speak out on campus issues," Bosco said. "These sessions complement the feedback I get from them."

Soviets' role weak at Madrid

Gorbachev pleads for foreign aid; opens Middle East Peace Conference

By the Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's oddly timed appeal for aid at the Mideast peace conference Wednesday underscored his country's secondary role in resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"The world community is becoming increasingly aware that what is happening in the Soviet Union has a larger bearing than any regional conflict on the vital interest of the greater part of today's world," the Soviet leader said after a keynote address by President Bush.

Bush said U.S. mediators at the conference intend to engage the Soviet Union as a force for positive change in the Middle East.

But Arab delegates were less charitable. They said the main Soviet role in the region had been its economic and political collapses following the coup attempt in August, thereby denying hard-line Arab states their traditional source of arms and diplomatic support.

Palestinian and Jordanian delegates responded to Bush's appeal for peace

Wilder

"No more black-and-white television sets are made in the United States," Wilder said. "Only two American companies now manufacture color television sets."

According to a story in the Kansas City Star, Zenith Electronics Corp. announced Tuesday it would shut down the last television assembly line in the United States at a plant in Springfield, Mo. The company said it would be moving three-fourths of its operations to plants in Mexico.

Wilder said there is a government-industry partnership that exists in Japan that makes it impossible for U.S. industries to penetrate. Wilder recently returned from a trip to Japan.

But Wilder said Japan is not the only nation that is moving onto the American industrial scene.

"The British government now exercises control over one of the largest oil companies, Standard Oil of Ohio, and as a result of subsidiaries, large oil reserves in our own country," he said. "But what really is disturbing is when a Japanese electronics giant like Fujitsu that uses technology derived from American research turns around and sues AT&T on the basis that

AT&T is a monopoly depriving the Japanese of their rights to build a better fiber optics link."

Wilder also discussed civil rights and legislation concerning minorities.

"After nearly two years of President Bush calling the civil rights bill a 'quota bill,' he has decided that he can live with it," he said.

He said he was opposed to quotas and said he felt people should be judged on their merit.

Wilder said Congress has already agreed to a compromise that will unbalance the Civil Rights Act of 1991.

"Minorities and the handicapped will have no caps on punitive damages in discrimination cases, but women will," Wilder said. "I can't understand that."

Wilder then discussed other problems in the presidency and other branches of government. He ended with some advice for the U.S. and its leaders.

"We must understand that whatever it is which we say and do, it must be for the ultimate good of the people — all of the people," he said. "That definition changes year after year, day by day."

Economy

the fact that housing is typically one of the leading forces pulling an economy out of recession.

While a second government report showed that consumer spending rose by 0.9 percent in September, the largest gain since March, economists were not impressed. They said this increase was overshadowed by a report Tuesday showing that consumer confidence fell in October.

President Bush held an economic strategy session at the White House on Wednesday following his return from Madrid, Spain. Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said that Bush wanted an "update session" on economic developments that occurred while he was attending the opening of the Middle East peace conference.

Bush administration officials have expressed growing concerns that the economy is failing to rebound strongly from the 1990-91 recession.

Christy Adams, senior in psychology, attended a luncheon for juniors and seniors Tuesday. Adams said the students talked about the idea discussed by Faculty Senate to charge students a fee for each class they drop.

She said she brought up this topic because she thought there should be an alternative.

"Many students enroll in 20 or 21 hours, knowing they are going to drop a class," Adams said. "I mentioned that maybe they should put a limit on the number of classes that can be dropped."

Students also talked to Bosco about some problems in the KSU Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and the Farrell Library funding situation. Bosco said the luncheons help to bring about positive change in certain situations.

"The first year we held them, in 1987, the big campus issue was the parking problem," Bosco said. "We had just recruited about 800 more students than usual that year, and there was no place to park. We discussed this at the meeting, took the information to President Wefald, and the result was a new parking lot north of Weber."

Storm gives campus icy coating

DAVID MAYES/Staff

A pair of pedestrians make their way along the icy sidewalk near the K-State Union Thursday afternoon. A steady freezing rain Thursday prompted University officials to close offices and cancel classes after 4 p.m.

Facilities close, tiles break and puddles form after bitter winter storm

By the Collegian Staff

Halloween looked a lot like Christmas.

After weeks and weeks of a long, dry Indian summer, Kansans got a bitter taste of winter Thursday as freezing rain and snow covered the northeast portion of the state.

The storm left roads slick in many parts of Kansas. A winter storm warning was in effect through Thursday night for both the central and northeast sections of the state.

Classes at K-State meeting after 4 p.m. were canceled because administrators and campus police were worried for both the students' and the staff's safety.

"Basically we closed early because the city was having trouble clearing the streets," said John Fairman, assistant vice president for University relations. "The water on the streets wasn't draining, creating some dangerous driving conditions. We didn't want students having to drive in this."

All non-essential personnel on campus were sent home early on Thursday, also. The Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex closed at 4 p.m., and Farrell Library closed its doors at 8 p.m.

The K-State Union Bookstore, Union Food Service, Statelibrary and Union Station closed early at 8 p.m., but the building kept regular hours. The costume dance at Union Station was also canceled.

Nikki Dechairo, clerk at the Union information desk, said business was slower than usual.

"Earlier it was really slow but around eight it started to get busier. It's definitely been slower than usual all day," she said.

She said as far as she knew, building hours would be normal on Friday.

"We're playing it by ear, but we'll probably be open the usual number of hours," she said.

Earlier in the day, a section of floor behind Kramer Food Center's "A" line buckled and broke apart due to the weather. Jon Nguyen, junior in business, witnessed the whole event.

"It happened around 11 a.m. Some guy was serving behind 'A' line, when all of a sudden, the floor just started to raise. The guy just stood there and said, 'Oh shit,'" Nguyen said.

Mike Walsh, painter/mason for housing, said the floor underneath the upper layer of tiles has been hollow for some time.

In these hollow spaces, moisture has collected both from the air and the constant use of water on the floor. With the drop of temperature all of a sudden, some of that moisture contracted, causing a release in the stress of the tiles.

"At first we were going to blame it on Mrs. Kramer's ghost — since it's Halloween, but it just broke," Walsh said.

The floor will be fixed by Monday, Walsh said.

Across campus a few architecture students found small lakes in their studios. One student had a name for the puddles forming on the floor in his interior design studio.

"We've got Lake Interior going on in here," he said.

Another student, Jeff Weaver, senior in architecture, said the leaks in the fourth- and fifth-year interior studios were caused by repainting done this summer.

"After our reorganization protest, (President Jon) Wefald toured the college and thought studios needed repainted," Weaver said. "It looks nice, but doesn't keep the weather out."

Weaver said the workers that repainted the studio, located in Seaton Court, did not replace the plastic sheets that carried the water from the center to the edges of the room.

"It's kind of ironic coming on the anniversary of our protests," he said.

Seaton Hall, along with several other campus buildings, experienced leaking roofs because of the slush buildup on the roofs of the buildings.

Weaver said the problem was es-leaking," Rose said. "We have people over here with wet vacs, but it isn't doing much good."

Rose said one of the worst leaks was in the office of Duane Nellis, head of the department of geography.

"We've moved things around in almost everybody's room," she said. "It's just a bad situation."

Several maps have been ruined by the water, Rose said.

This is not the earliest snow or sleet ever recorded in Manhattan. Mary Knapp, extension assistant, works in the Weather Data Library at K-State. The library has kept a record of the weather affecting Manhattan since 1857 for the National Weather Service.

"In 1941, we had two inches of snow on Oct. 31," Knapp said. "If the prediction holds out for Friday, we should get 4 to 6 inches which would be a record."

Knapp had an explanation for the sleet that fell Thursday.

"We're right in the transition zone between the warmer air and the colder air," Knapp said. "They (the NWS) are expecting significant icing tonight."

Ice on the trees is expected to cause branches to break under the weight of the ice and accumulated snow.

"One of the problems is that the pecially bad in the Seaton Court area. Water leaking could potentially damage students design projects.

"There's nothing like working 48 hours on a studio project and coming in the next day and finding out it's damaged," Weaver said.

Dickens Hall was another campus building that had water pouring in during the morning and afternoon.

Donna Rose, office assistant in geography, said water was pouring in everywhere.

"Just about every roof we have is

Are you in class?

The decision on whether or not to close the University because of the weather is made by Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. If the weather was bad enough, facilities and/or K-State police called Krause around 5:30 a.m. and gave him the weather conditions. If he thought the weather warranted closing the University, he called John Fairman, assistant vice president for University relations, who then contacted the media.

Arabs, Israelis repeat rhetoric

Talks atmosphere tense; opening speeches at odds

By the Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — Arab delegates spurned an invitation Thursday from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir to go to Israel to negotiate.

In their first exchange on the floor of the historic conference, Arab and Israeli leaders traded recriminations and clung to familiar positions. The Arabs demanded all the land they lost in the 1967 war. Israel demanded recognition before it would even consider yielding territory.

The atmosphere was more confrontational than in Wednesday's opening session. Shamir called it a "garden of thorns."

The Arabs argued that peace was conditional on Israeli willingness to give up the captured territories. "Every inch," insisted Syria's foreign minister, Farouk al-Sharaa.

Shamir said, "The issue is not territory but our existence."

"We appeal to you to renounce the 'jihad' (holy war) against Israel," he said.

"Blessed are the peacemakers," said Jordanian Foreign Minister Kamel Abu-Jaber. "We are willing to live side by side on the land," said Haidar Abdul-Shafi, representing the Palestinians.

Shamir began his speech with a simple "Shalom."

Although the Arab and Israeli delegation heads did not applaud each other's speeches, Thursday's session was a milestone. It marked the first time Palestinians and Israelis have addressed each other in a formal negotiating format.

While the conference itself kept to the format scripted by its architect, Secretary of State James Baker, questions arose over how it will develop when the ceremonies end and

Congress to gain more minorities

New redistricting rules will ensure representation

By the Associated Press

The U.S. Congresspersons elected in 1992 will include far more black and Hispanic members than any Congress in history. That is being ensured now, in one of the most significant rounds of redistricting ever.

New rules issued in an updated Voting Rights Act have added a new dimension to this old political bloodsport — the once-a-decade exercise of redrawing the lines that divide one political district from the next.

The radical mandate isn't the only change since 1982. Computers have added a high-tech spin to this year's redistricting, and a new political balance has made it more contentious than ever.

The minority gains, however, are the most potentially significant change. Under a 1982 revision to the 1964 Voting Rights Act, states must ensure intact political districts for minority communities rather than splintering their votes into mostly white districts.

As a result, Rep. Martin Frost, who chairs the Democrats' redistricting organization, Impact 2000, estimates there will be about 20 more minority lawmakers in the next Congress.

What, if anything, that will mean for the nation's political balance is difficult to say, even though Democrats and Republicans say virtually all the new seats will be Democratic.

In one of those Machiavellian twists of democracy, some Democrats worry that Republicans will pack so many Democratic voters into black and Hispanic districts that surrounding districts, purged of Democrats, will fall to the Republicans.

"It's a factor in redistricting which sometimes accrues to the benefit of the Republicans," said Tom Hofeller, redistricting director for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

He added, however, that the process will often work to the Democrats' advantage.

Bernard Grofman, who has served as a consultant on redistricting to both parties, agrees. He sees "a kind of feeding frenzy on the part of Democratic incumbents to take the gains on the part of blacks out on the hides of Republicans."

"The Democrats have been able, by artful gerrymandering, to draw districts which represent black and Hispanic voting strengths but also don't benefit Republicans," said Grofman, professor of political science at the University of California, Irvine.

Frost noted that Republicans stand to make significant gains in new suburban districts that are created as a result of urban sprawl.

"This thing could wind up being a virtual wash nationwide — what they gain in suburban seats, we gain in minority seats, and nobody gains any advantage," he said.

Both sides agree it's too early to tell who will win in this year's redistricting, which is based on the 1990 census.

Democrats say they're pleased by the way things went in the first dozen states to complete their new congressional district maps. In Texas, three new districts are safely in Democratic hands. The remapping elsewhere —

Georgia, Indiana, North Carolina and eight smaller states — left the Democrats with no significant losses or gains.

Republicans basically agree but say their big prizes have not yet been awarded. Hofeller says the GOP is hoping to gain eight to 12 seats — five to seven in California alone — when it's over.

"It's certainly more positive than '81," he said.

"You can't really predict," said Frost, D-Texas. A lot of decisions will be left to the courts, he said "and courts are very unpredictable."

Courts frequently take over when legislatures and governors reach a stalemate. Because Republicans have made inroads in some states where Democrats once enjoyed complete political control, there will be more stalemates this year than 10 years ago.

According to Hofeller, all but 39 congressional seats in 1981 were in states that were entirely controlled by one party. This year, he said, there are 235 seats in 17 states where neither party has control.

Supplies get past Yugoslav blockade

DUBROVNIK, Yugoslavia (AP) - A flotilla bringing badly needed food and medicine sailed through a federal navy blockade into this ancient port Thursday, as Serbian-led federal forces attacked elsewhere in Croatia.

Thousands of people jammed Dubrovnik's dock to greet the Slavija ferry and 28 other boats carrying 850 people, including Croatian leaders, were delayed by gunfire and a search by federal authorities.

Apparently mindful of world opinion as an increasingly isolated Serbia prepares for European Community-sponsored peace talks Tuesday, the Navy let the flotilla enter Dubrovnik.

Five people were killed and 11 wounded in Osijek, capital of the war-torn eastern province Slavonia, by howitzer fire from the Serb-held Baranja region, defense officials said. In Valpovo, just to the west, another four died and 17 were wounded in an artillery attack.

K.C. abduction suspect named

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - A 26-year-old man was named Thursday as the suspect in four kidnappings of young girls. Mayor Emanuel Cleaver issued a plea to angry citizens to help find him but to let police make the arrest.

At least three of the girls abducted from midtown Kansas City between Sept. 14 and Oct. 25 were sexually molested before they were released. More charges are expected to be filed as the investigation continues, prosecutors said.

The suspect, William A. McClinton of Kansas City, was charged Wednesday in state court with one count of kidnapping, one count of indecent exposure and two counts of sodomy, Deputy Chief Al Lomax of the Kansas City Police Department said.

McClinton was also charged in federal court with one count of indecent exposure and two counts of sodomy, Deputy Chief Al Lomax of the Kansas City Police Department said.

Lomax and prosecutors who joined him at a press conference, citing fears of jeopardizing their cases, refused to answer questions about what evidence led police and FBI agents to McClinton.

The abductions have outraged the neighborhood where they occurred. On Friday, a man driving through the area was pulled from his car and beaten because some people thought he resembled a composite sketch of the suspect.

Hays forms Medical Technology School

HAYS (AP) - Easing the rural health care crisis in northwest Kansas is a primary goal of the newly formed School of Medical Technology at Hays Pathology Laboratory.

Beginning in January, students can earn a medical technology degree by attending 12-month courses offered at the lab.

For a $6,200 tuition fee, students can specialize in several areas including laboratory testing, antibiotics, microbiology and chemistry.

Medical technologists are in demand, according to the school's program director, Jan Hudzicki, who said the school has been a long awaited project at the lab.

The studies are rigorous, Hudzicki said, but students will leave the school equipped to seek employment in even the most advanced medical facilities.

A few hospitals are offering work contracts in which students can attend the school at the hospital's expense in exchange for work at that hospital immediately after graduation.

The school is intended to serve as a supplement to a college-level education.

Convention management is group's focus

The College of Human Ecology established a new organization Oct. 23 to prepare members to succeed in one of the fastest-growing professions in the United States: convention management.

The idea of beginning the Professional Convention Management Association began last year, when Ed Polivka, a member of the national organization, gave a lecture through the College of Human Ecology. He talked about career opportunities in the convention business, so K-State decided to establish a class to introduce hotel and restaurant management students to this rising profession.

Bobbie Flaherty began teaching a convention business class last year and is now the adviser for PCMA. She said members are beginning to set goals and objectives for the future of the organization.

"Because K-State has a limited curriculum in the convention business, PCMA is a good way for students to gain experience," she said. "They will be working with the Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau to give them an idea of what the profession involves."

Dennis Mildnerberger, senior in hotel and restaurant management and president of PCMA, said members will also help register people for conventions at local hotels.

In February, PCMA will have a seminar similar to the pre-student institute at the national convention. The goal is to prepare students for the profession through resume building, interviewing, etiquette and appropriate professional attire.

Winter storm hits area

Coating of ice may cause limbs on campus to fall

CRAIG KREUTZER
Collegian Reporter

Half of the trees on the K-State campus can be classified as potentially hazardous to people and property.

Charles Long, associate professor of horticulture, said to be hazardous the tree must be located in an area in which falling branches would cause damage.

"About half of the trees in prominent locations around campus could be labeled within the hazardous category," Long said.

Long's arboriculture class performed a study earlier this semester on the number of trees with the potential to be a danger to people and property.

"Each student picked five different trees that could be classified as potentially dangerous," Long said. "They then assessed what needed to be done to correct the hazards."

Long said many trees on campus are aging to the point that they will die without special care. Although it would be educational for his students to take care of the trees on campus, he said, it's just not practical.

"It's a full-time job to take care of trees," Long said. "We really don't have the manpower to take care of the whole campus."

Grounds maintenance has the responsibility of taking care of the campus. Manager Tom Lee said each year groundskeepers look for potentially dangerous limbs or trees.

"During the winter, we make a concentrated effort to take care of problem trees," Lee said. "We will fix any tree we see that needs to have dead removed from it, from either a safety standpoint or for the health of the tree."

He said a tree labeled as hazardous isn't necessarily going to fall.

"The potential is minimal," Long said, "but it does exist."

With winter on its way, Long said, ice freezing on the trees adds weight to the branches and increases their chance of falling.

"We may see some fairly sizable limbs come down if ice continues to build up," Long said.

Ice is a danger to all trees.

"Any time you get ice on the branches, the potential for hazards increases," Long said. "Even healthy trees can break down from the weight of the ice."

Snow and ice storms in western Kansas scare Halloween out of two towns

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Up to a foot of snow covered parts of western Kansas Thursday as a Halloween storm threw enough of a scare into the state to prompt a delay in traditional trick-or-treating in at least two cities.

The first sizable storm of the season also included sleet and freezing rain that left roads slick in many areas of central Kansas, and snow was developing there as well. A winter storm warning was in effect through Thursday night for both the central and northeast sections of the state.

The National Weather Service said the snow was expected to end in the west around midnight, continuing until about noon Friday in the east after leaving accumulations of 3 to 6 inches there.

Another 1 to 3 inches of snow was likely in the west, forecasters said.

Ice caused some power outages Thursday from Atchison County across Jackson County and near Junction City in Geary County.

Schools closed in many areas hit by the storm, and a number of high school football games scheduled for Thursday night were postponed. The Kansas High School Activities Association said the cross country meet, scheduled this Saturday in Manhattan, had been postponed to Nov. 9.

The mayors of both Garden City and Hutchinson issued proclamations postponing trick-or-treating in their communities. At Hutchinson, Mayor Joan Schrag declared Saturday to be trick-or-treat day, while the Garden City postponement was until Monday.

"Snow and cold temperatures have combined to create an unpleasant atmosphere even to ghosts and goblins," said Garden City Mayor Dennis Mesa.

Rohn Brently, 12, of Hays, felt great when he learned that school had been called off, but not so happy when his mother decreed that trick-or-treating was also off.

"That's a bummer," he said between sled runs at a neighbor's steep driveway.

A low pressure system moving from northeast Texas into Oklahoma and Arkansas was pushing more snow toward the south-central portion of the state.

In northwest Kansas, near St. Francis and Gove, the snow accumulation from storms Wednesday and Thursday reached 12 inches.

Other snowfall amounts included 10 inches at Hill City, 8 at Hoxie, Phillipsburg, Oberlin and Norton, 7 at Garden City, Colby, Leoti, Scott City and WaKeeney and 6 at Stockton and Atwood. Hays had only 2 inches.

Barb Roemer of the Gove County sheriff's department, tried to see some good in the storm.

"We need the moisture, I guess," she said. "I keep trying to tell myself that. The farmers will be happy."

"I think the snow will be beneficial to all our wheat crop, if it lays on the field," said Whitey Whitehill, Finney County extension agent in Garden City.

However, he said he'd seen some signs of drifting, and also said the cold temperatures will take some of the fall growth wheat farmers like to see.

Lee Reeve, of the Reeve Cattle Co. near Garden City, said livestock could be hurt if the bad weather continues.

"Where you get into trouble is when it starts to thaw out and the cattle get wet," said Reeve.

U.S. Air Express canceled two morning flights from Hays to Denver and Kansas City, although the Hays Municipal Airport remained open.

An overnight low of 17 in Hays set an Oct. 31 record for the city, breaking the mark of 20 set in 1925 and matched in 1954. Goodland set a record low for the third consecutive day as the temperature dropped to 12, bettering the 17-degree mark that stood since 1935.

After overnight lows ranging from the mid-teens northwest to the lower 30s in the southeast, highs of 30 to 40 were forecast for Friday.

The Arabs want to talk on neutral ground, at least until Israel proves willing to consider their demand for territorial concessions, Palestinian rights and an end to building Jewish settlements in the occupied territories.

"The momentum in Madrid is good, the spirit in Madrid is good, why don't we keep it here?" said Jordan's foreign minister, Kamel Abu Jaber.

Manhattan firefighters extinguish the last embers in the remains of a Riley Construction trailer behind 705 Pecan Circle early Thursday morning. The cause of the fire is unknown. No gas or electrical lines were connected to the trailer when the contents of the trailer caught fire around 1 a.m. The trailer was behind the Thermal Comfort building.

Student Senate canceled

Inclement weather blamed for second delay of two bills

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Student Senate's meeting agenda was full Thursday night. The Union Big Eight Room, however, in which Senate usually meets, was empty.

Due to inclement weather, Senate Chair Pete Marsh decided around 3 p.m. Thursday that it would be best to cancel the regularly scheduled meeting.

The $240,000 Educational Opportunity Fund allocation bill, which was handled back to committee last week for reconsideration, was supposed to be voted on Thursday night.

Also requiring a vote was a bill to temporarily suspend the Senate intern program since the next term is shortened to only one semester.

This is the second time these two bills have been postponed. A controversial motion was passed in last week's Senate to delay the second hearings of the bills.

Education Senator Jim Struber said he was relieved when he heard the meeting was canceled.

"We were expecting to have a very long meeting due to the agenda," he said. "If we got out at, say, 3 a.m., it would be cold and very dangerous to be walking or driving home."

Struber said Senate would just have to take care of the business next week.

Craig Uhrich, chairman of Senate Finance Committee, said it was probably a good idea to cancel the meeting because he suspected many senators might not have shown up anyway because the weather was so bad.

"With things like EOF, it's good if we can all be there because that's a large sum of money," he said.

On the other side of the coin, Uhrich said he hoped the cancellation would not set Senate's time schedule too far back.

"If this pushes all the meetings back, I hope we don't run out of time this term," he said. "There are several special allocations scheduled to be on the floor next week."

Uhrich said another important topic coming up for discussion is Finance Committee's decision last Sunday to set aside $20,000 for Racial Ethnic Harmony Week. Only the accrued interest from the $20,000 would be available for expenditure.

Community Service deserves funding

K-State students have been a service to Kansas communities.

Unfortunately, some of this service may be in jeopardy. The Community Service Program's funding is being cut from the current $20,000 for fiscal year 1991 to $7,750 for fiscal year 1992.

Allocations for CSP are being examined by the Educational Opportunity Funds Committee, and the committee has recommended the cut in funding.

EOF funds provide for the stipends and scholarships of Summer Team members, who spend eight weeks in Kansas communities implementing a development project designed by community leaders. CSP has already suffered a reduction in state work-study funding, which has decreased the number of students who are able to participate in the programs.

K-State's rural service model has been cited as one of the most comprehensive university service programs in the country. It would be a shame and a great loss for this advocate of community service to be put in danger because of additional funding losses.

Student senators can still restore the funding for CSP. Hopefully, for the sake of CSP, students and communities, they will.

Bosco out to lunch — great idea

Pat Bosco, you're a peach.

As the dean of student life, Bosco takes his title seriously and goes out of his way to actually listen to students.

Every fall semester, Bosco randomly selects a few students to have lunch with him, during which he encourages them to share their thoughts about University issues ranging from enrollment to parking. He schedules these sessions three or four times a semester so he can get a good idea of students' general feelings that might not otherwise be heard.

In general, these are just gripe sessions for the students, which is something many administrators seem to avoid like the plague.

And the best thing is he doesn't just do this to boost his image in the eyes of students or colleagues. In fact, he doesn't even publicize it. These meetings are scheduled quietly, without production.

We just happened to hear about it through the friend-of-a-friend grapevine.

Another good thing about Bosco is he doesn't just listen — he takes action. The parking lot north of Weber Hall came to be after one of the student luncheons.

Maybe if more administrators took the time to listen to the students and listen to what they are saying, we could all more easily reach a common goal — education.

Yes, Bosco is definitely a peach.

American politicians are

DUKEing IT OUT

Louisiana politician's credentials scary

SHAWN BRUCE

By now, the vast majority of America is familiar with the story of David Duke. Campaigning on a promise to bring power back to the white people in America, he's secured himself at least a chance of being the next governor of Louisiana.

He claims his ex-Nazi and Ku Klux Klan days are behind him. Where he left them is anybody's guess — maybe on the same operating room floor where he had his facelift.

But his plastic surgery can't hide the beliefs contained within the man. Despite his best efforts, views of whom David Duke really is pop up every once in a while. He's been caught mailing Nazi material out of his Senatorial office, been accused of a sex scandal and, within the past month, has accused black churches and groups of enticing black voters with offers of free fried chicken.

And with that portrait of the man, the question becomes, where the hell is this man getting the support that has propelled him into a run-off election?

It's simple to lay the blame on rural, poor and uneducated white people. Duke certainly has their support, in fact, probably unanimously. But that alone does not account for Duke's success in a state that has seven cities with a population of more than 100,000 people.

Duke is attracting middle-class voters, and he's doing it in record numbers. Part of the credit (if you call it that) goes to Duke himself. Through a computer data base that's the envy of other politicians, Duke has reached an impressive number of people and raised an incredible amount of money. For all his appeals to "traditional values," Duke has used 1990s technology in a way that other candidates will have to study to use and be successful.

But somewhere and somehow, middle-class voters in Louisiana made a decision that the system doesn't work anymore. And the only solution they see is David Duke.

It's sad, really. Take, for instance, the case of Duke supporter Jim McPherson.

Once upon a time, McPherson was a fan of John F. Kennedy — almost joined the Peace Corps. He wore a black armband to commemorate the death of Martin Luther King Jr. And now, he works on David Duke's campaign.

McPherson says the government doesn't work right anymore. He says politicians aren't believable, which, considering his candidate's plastic surgery, seems slightly hypocritical. And he believes the solutions Duke offers are the best.

So simplicity rules. Duke thinks welfare should be gone. Screw those who wouldn't have housing or even be able to eat without it. Black people have too many laws to benefit them. Gone. So what if we see a return to racial division?

Once upon a time, people like McPherson looked at the big picture. They found problems within the system, but they worked toward positive change. Once upon a time, taking steps forward into the future was more important than taking steps back into the past.

It's not just Louisiana anymore either. Duke's mailing list includes people from all over the country. And politicians all over the country, after seeing Duke's success, are adopting his ideas whether they subscribe to them or not.

So Louisiana is really nothing more than an example of America in 1991. And if David Duke should happen to win this gubernatorial race, America is going to be really scary — at least for those of us who think.

WHERE NO MAN HAS GONE BEFORE

'Star Trek' creator will be missed

Recently, I lost a friend.

He was a friend who had followed me through my childhood and into my college years, someone who made the future for me and so many others seem completely within our control.

Last week, Gene Roddenberry, the creator and curator of the "Star Trek" phenomenon, died of a heart attack.

In the wake of his death, he leaves behind millions who didn't admire him because he made a neat sci-fi show or for the considerable contribution he made to the pop culture of this country.

Rather, they adored him because through his eyes the fate of the human race was not set in concrete. He realized that people could overcome prejudice and hatred and use the energies invested in these worthless emotions toward constructive ends.

In a world of cynics, Roddenberry was one of the few who firmly believed in the notion that humans were not destined for nuclear apocalypse, and this attitude was constantly reflected in each one of the series' episodes.

As I said, I considered him a friend. Not a friend in the sense of a personal relationship, but in the sense that he was someone I looked to for inspiration, for something more than the mostly inane garbage that hopelessly clutters our television screens.

In Roddenberry's future world, we found another thing that seemed all too rare: reality. For the characters he created, the line between right and wrong wasn't always clearly defined. While people made mistakes, they didn't allow these mistakes to hinder the pursuit of their goals. And the pursuit of goals was a good thing, never to be cast aside with the passing of time.

And he gave us other things.

He gave us heroes, even if Captain Kirk was really carried through the galaxy on his libido, and Spock had his ears held back with masking tape. The heroes were real people, subject to human failings, even if they weren't human.

He gave us the future to see. And he never minded if everyone wore pastel hippie clothing and if the planets looked like Hollywood sound stages with plastic foam rocks. These were the backdrops that served as receptacles for the action and pathos, humor and seriousness.

He gave insight into the human condition, where it was up to us to suspend our disbelief and judge for ourselves the questions set before us.

But more than that, he gave us something to project into our own fantasies. "Star Trek" was, and still is, a malleable world, one where anyone can become the hero.

I didn't draw these conclusions overnight but instead from years of watching. When I was 11 years old, I had the opportunity to hear Roddenberry speak at Marymount College in Salina. He was a quiet, unassuming man, cheerfully and fully answering any questions put to him by the audience.

Through the simplified explanations of how the transporter effect was created to what kind of plywood the bridge consoles were made of, I could see the hope in him for everyone, the boundless energy that allowed him to keep producing new and innovative ideas even after nearly two decades of creating.

This column was never intended as a form of hero worship, nor as a pitch for watching "Star Trek" (as my roommates would have you believe) but instead to show appreciation for a man who strove to inject originality and creativity into whatever he created and shared with us.

Thank you, Mr. Roddenberry. This world will be less of a place in your absence, and the place you go to will only gain by your presence.

Art, morality hard to define

Editor,

As long as Ruth Ann Warren is going on about art and morality like she knows all about it, let me run off a few names: Leonardo, Michaelangelo, Donatello and Raphael — the artists and the turtles.

First, the artists. All four of these masters depicted the nude, and they did it without strategically placed hands.

True, these paintings have never been reproduced in the Collegian, but I've seen them larger than life in an art history class while I was reading the Collegian. Besides, we're all reasonably mature college students (until we get a hold of some chalk), and we can handle a little bare flesh. If I'm wrong, somebody better call Playboy and tell them to forget it.

Now, the turtles. Boy, are they funny. Sometimes I skip classes to laugh at all their jokes. Wait. Jokes — that gives me an idea. You don't suppose it was all a joke, do you? You don't think that maybe they thought people would think it was funny, do you? Yeah, maybe it was all done in jest, with no sinister plans of corrupting our youth with visions of demon rock 'n' rollers freezing on the Kansas prairie.

Naw, they probably just want Grandma's Trunk to go out of business. Art and morality are possibly the most vague terms in existence. And despite what Jesse Helms thinks, their definitions are peculiar to the individual and can't be forced on anyone else.

So, I'm sorry if your sense of morality and art were offended by a picture that's already turning yellow and decomposing. I got a good laugh out of it and turned the page.

Thomas scandal Republicans' doing

Editor,

My compliments to Jason Hamilton's comment, "I don't care if Thomas is a slimeball, a pervert, a Satan worshipper or a space alien. None of it has any bearing on his performance as a Supreme Court Justice." Why was this point completely ignored during the hearings? I suspect it was by design.

Ask yourself if you think Thomas had a chance of being appointed to the Supreme Court on merit. Then ask yourself if Thomas committed sexual harassment. I don't think so. This is what I propose happened.

Who stood to gain from the situation? Not the Democrats. If they didn't like Thomas, they didn't have to confirm him. The Republicans are the obvious beneficiaries of the scandal that ensued. I believe the Republicans planted Hill to distract from Thomas' clear judicial inadequacies. Not only did this move completely divert attention from the important issues, it gave the Republican Party a chance to accuse Democrats of political sabotage (especially since few believe Hill). The fact that Thomas wasn't found guilty was the idea. By planting a story, which was at best "weak," the Republicans set the Democrats up.

Let's look at the situation. If the Democrats don't approve Thomas, they look like rats in front of America. The Democratic Party can't afford this. It looks like sabotage.

So, with their tails between their legs, they confirmed Thomas. What happens now? Thomas serves as Bush's "rough-shot puppet." Bush now has the power to control such issues as abortion, free speech, etc. In the future, I foresee this severely undermining the delicate political balance between liberal and conservative.

My hat is off to those disgusting Republican senators. This was undoubtedly the most well-planned, most flawlessly designed example of political hardball of our times — nasty politics at its best.

Think before blaming others

Editor,

This is in response to Troy Eckart's letter, "Raccoon loses life to speed demon," in the Oct. 23 Collegian.

I am very impressed with your great compassion toward this and other nocturnal animals. You spoke of someone who was negligent and who, thus, possibly took a life. As far as I am concerned, however, you, Troy, are just as much at fault as the person who hit this animal. You chastised this person for being in such a hurry. Were you in such a hurry to complete your errand that you could not stop to help this defenseless animal? Instead you managed to swerve around it watching as it blinked its eyes to the oncoming traffic.

You said you intended to stop on your way back, but upon arrival, you found the animal gone. Did you honestly think it would be there, either alive or dead, when you returned? And, of course, it is only a raccoon, and it would definitely have been too much trouble to see if it had maybe crawled into the ditch. Had you stopped at the time you saw this animal get hit you may have been able to either move it off the road so it would not be struck again or end its suffering if it were too badly injured to survive.

I realize this was a tragic thing that occurred. Believe me, I've pulled my share of injured animals off the road. These animals do have feelings, and they do experience a lot of pain.

I would like to ask, however, what exactly is the difference in an animal losing its life to a car and losing its life to a gun? Have you considered the millions of animals that die at the hands of hunters and in slaughterhouses so that they may be included in the human diet? Maybe if people would stop being hypocrites, lives could be saved.

Food and blues drive Elmo

Local band of 'Deadbeats' offer variety of live music for the Little Apple

PAT WALLECK
 A&E Writer

"I don't like to do this for myself. The blues is a healing music, and the world needs healing." — Dave "Elmo" Bailey

Along with the emergence of young, local bands, some older Manhattan musicians join the fight to keep live music in the Little Apple thriving. Ladies and gentlemen: Elmo and the Deadbeats.

Elmo and the Deadbeats came into existence last summer. The musicians group's musicians — Steve Strong, guitar; Brad Brown, bass; and Darin Pelfery, drums — were stuck playing country music and felt the need to play music for more than just money.

Into the picture stepped a man. A large man. A man known as Elmo. Just by looking into his deep, dark eyes and "built for comfort" stature, one could see this guy liked to eat. "Food is my only addiction," Elmo, alias Dave Bailey, said. "It is the one thing I cannot live without, but I can still move with the best of them."

His love for food is second only to his love for the blues. After a stint in Los Angeles where Bailey honed his strong and emotional voice, he came back to Manhattan to pursue his musical passion. Elmo professes the blues.

Bailey comes from a musical family. With his parents' encouragement, he was able to fully pursue his love of music. His brother, Duane, also took this encouragement to heart and is now a guitarist for the group Chicago.

Strong, the Deadbeats' guitarist, has a heavily jazz-influenced background. Some musicians in town consider him the most melodic guitar player they've ever seen.

Besides playing in the Deadbeats, Strong also does country gigs as well as running his own studio in Manhattan called Strong Box Productions.

J. KYLE WYATT/Staff

Elmo and the Deadbeats frontman Dave "Elmo" Bailey belts out a tune while Brad Brown backs him up on the bass.

Pickin' and grinnin' and lookin' all too cool

HEATHER ANDERSON

Rapid successive tones emanating from the massive amplifiers pierced through the sultry, yet frenzied excitement in the air. The guitar player stood drenched in the spotlight center stage — nimble fingers flying, sweat pouring off the brow, eyes squinted and mouth puckered as if he had just taken a quick quaff of three-week-old chunky milk.

Isn't it amazing how something any average Joe would look like a goon doing is suddenly cool when a so-called guitar god does it?

I remember when I was 6 years old and learning how to ride my bike. The only way possible to stay upright was to widen my eyes, roll in my lips and stick out my tongue. This face also applied to roller skating, hula hooping, softball, kickball and piano playing.

No wonder my mother made fun of me. Funny how the sucked-in cheeks, flared nostrils and closed eyes of Jimi Hendrix probably had a big hand in my conception, yet I looked like an idiot.

Regardless of what is fair, most guitar legends have their own patented guitar face. Hendrix developed such a popular face, you can still see it today by renting a copy of "Purple Rain."

Stevie Ray Vaughan continued the tradition of trailblazing tunes and funny faces. He had the closed eyes of concentration, but he also shook his head in a negative fashion as if even he couldn't believe what magic was flowing from his instrument.

B.B. King has the strained look of man wrestling his instrument like an animal. It's as if the player and the guitar take turns being in control — and you can read it all on his face.

So many share the basic MTV-pose look. Mouths open and eyes wide, Poison types look as if they are gasping for air through encompassing Final Net fumes.

Steve Vai also makes his contributions, although they are arguably more

Canadian dance company lands in McCain

'Broken Wings' to be performed by O Vertigo Danse

By the Collegian Staff

O Vertigo Danse, a Montreal dance company, will perform "Broken Wings (Train D'Enfer)" at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

The company was founded in 1984 by Montreal choreographer Ginette Laurin. It quickly made its mark on the international scene with a reputation that extends beyond the borders of Quebec and Canada.

Since it began, O Vertigo has toured extensively and been invited to perform at prestigious festivals in Europe and North America.

"Broken Wings" is set on an open stage, made station-like by two sets of fused wooden seats. The dance opens with men and women coming on stage like travelers in transit bound for an unknown destination.

Their bodies embrace, their eyes search longingly and meet for a moment before they turn away from each other, stricken by a strange sense of unrest.

In a space that evokes a station, seven dancers come and go. Over them, angels appear, giving rise to a dance that transforms the commonplace into a fantastic journey.

There is no stationmaster, no train schedule, no doorway leading to a platform. No train will come, blowing its whistle to summon the passengers.

"The idea of this piece is very intriguing," McCain Director Richard Martin said. "The set reminds me of 'The Twilight Zone.' This creates tension and frustration mixed with lots of emotions, which makes the piece very interesting."

Martin said there is no storyline, but it does contain a thread of content. He said imagination is the highest quality found within the piece.

The success of O Vertigo comes from the diverse talents of its dancers and their individual strengths. Their energy in performance and their versatility, combined with a knowledge of movement gives their dancing a deep and intimate meaning.

Engaged fully in the creative process, the dancers play an active role in giving shape and form to the choreography. Their training in various physical disciplines is extensive, and all pursue other artistic disciplines. "The dancers are physically gifted," Martin said. "They are the finest dancers around."

Laurin's training as a gymnast, her movement and the pleasure she gets from confronting the body's limits have led her to favor a highly dynamic style.

O Vertigo Danse is a Mid-America Arts Alliance Program made possible by the Canadian government. Mid-America Arts Alliance is a non-profit regional arts organization whose partners include the state arts agencies of Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, the National Endowment for the Arts and private contributors.

McCain tries to find interesting groups or soloist performances, Martin said.

"Kansas City is far away, and the people in this area shouldn't be denied from the world of arts and what is going on," Martin said. "I want to acquaint people with various performances, and this is why we are looking forward to the performance by O Vertigo Danse. It will acquaint people with Canadian performances."

Martin said it is not easy to attract people to dance performances like this because people have not been exposed to it.

Tickets are $15 for public and faculty, $13 for senior citizens and $7.50 for K-State students and children.

King puts new twist on horrifying tales

Black humor shines in 'Needful Things,' characters rich, lively

LISA EDMUNDS
 A&E Writer

"It was a dark and stormy night."

Ha! If you're looking for the traditional ghosts, goblins, ghouls and other spooky happenings in the new Stephen King novel, you may just have to hold out until next Halloween for a good scare.

Instead, "Needful Things" offers a frightening tale of another color.

Fans may recognize some of the characters from earlier Castle Rock tales — Ace Merrill and Sheriff Pangborn, for instance. All the characters in this novel seem familiar, not because King falls into one-dimensional stereotypes but because he continues to write about America — people we know.

"Needful Things" is filled with people like the Devil Dog-eating Cora Rusk, whose rear end is as wide as an ax handle. With descriptions like that, it doesn't take much imagination to fall in love with these characters.

The premise of "Needful Things" is

DAVID SVOBODA

Chiefs need a tutor

Six weeks of student teaching at Manhattan High School have made me a bit of an expert on grading.

Tests, essays, articles — you name it, I've put the red pen to it.

Now, it's time for me to do the same thing with the first-half performance of the Kansas City Chiefs.

And, unfortunately, not all grades given the Chiefs in this midterm review will be the kind Marty Schottenheimer would want to take home to Mom.

A 6-3 record is fantastic, really, when one considers the caliber of the opposition through the first nine games. Buffalo, Miami, Houston, Los Angeles — all were playoff teams in the AFC a year ago. And the Chiefs won three of the four tilts with those clubs.

Add victories over Atlanta and San Diego — on the road, no less — and you've got the six-win total.

Equally disheartening, though, have been the three losses. Houston was the playoff team KC couldn't get by, handing the Chiefs a loss in the Astrodome. It was a game, however, in which the offense seemed never in sync, while the defense dominated.

A great effort on one side of the ball was wasted. This would become/had become a recurring theme.

Just one week before the Houston loss, the Chiefs dropped their only home contest of the year, to New Orleans. Yep, the Saints are better, and they'll probably be a playoff team in 1991. But a home loss against a team with an inferior 1990 record was very disappointing.

To the credit of Schottenheimer's crew, four straight wins followed the New Orleans and Houston losses. But then came you-know-who.

Will a Schottenheimer-coached team ever win in Denver? Not this year, barring a playoff meeting.

The streak-ending loss to the Broncos was a bitter pill to swallow, and it revealed once more the soft underbelly that KC has shown a bit too much lately — an inconsistent offense and a defense prone to giving up the big play.

Ditto that estimation in reviewing the team's performance in the win over the Raiders. The Chiefs were lucky that the Raiders are not the team they were in 1990, when they rolled to the AFC West title. The Chiefs' secondary was riddled by one of the league's most inconsistent performers (Jay Schroeder), and the offense came to life only after an opportunistic interception return.

So where does all of this leave the Chiefs?

A position-by-position look, with first-half grade and second-half projection, follows:

Quarterback — Could we have realistically expected Steve DeBerg to be as brilliant as he was a year ago? He hasn't been, though he's still the best KC's got. Grade: B-. Projection: His best is yet to come.

Running backs — The emergence of Harvey Williams, coupled with the return to form of Christian Okoye makes this group even better than last year at this time, if that's possible. Where have you gone, Barry Word? Grade: A-. Projection: Word and Todd McNair will become even more vital, giving this group a solid A.

Receivers — Another solid rookie, Tim Barnett, has done a nice job of filling in for Stephone Paige, who has been injured. Robb Thomas has done a steady job, as well. Grade: B. Projection: This could be one of the NFL's steadiest units with a healthy Paige and an up-to-par Emile Harry.

Offensive linemen — DeBerg is getting the necessary time to throw, and Okoye continues to benefit from great blocks. Look at Williams' success, and trace it back to this point. Grade: A-. Projection: Can't really be much better.

Defensive linemen — Bill Maas is having the best season he's had in Harriers expected to battle for titles at Big 8 meet

Put up or shut up time has arrived. The K-State men's and women's cross country squads travel to Lawrence Saturday for the Big Eight Cross Country Championships at Rim Rock Farm.

The women have been tabbed by the league's coaches as the favorites, while the Wildcat men face the seemingly insurmountable task of unseating Iowa State, a national power.

Coach John Capriotti is confident both teams are ready for the competition, regardless of the weather conditions they might encounter. Clear skies and highs in the 30s are forecast.

"We really haven't had a fall," Capriotti said regarding the weather. "We've gone from warm to cold overnight. But performing in the cold is really an individual thing, though."

Capriotti is fairly certain his individuals are ready to go. The women's squad has had particularly strong workouts lately, he said.

"The women have definitely had their best workouts in the last two weeks, no question about it," Capriotti said.

Though the Wildcat women are a favorite among the league coaches, Capriotti said their prediction may have failed to take one thing into account.

"We're ranked as only the third best team in our district," he said. "But they picked us. I was thinking that maybe they did that while thinking that Janet Haskin would be back."

"But if there's one thing I can tell them for certain, it's that Haskin has been redshirted."

Despite the loss of the team's pre-season No. 1, Capriotti and senior Renee Russell both think K-State's women are as talented and as deep as ever.

"I think the other coaches would tell you that if they lost their top performer, they wouldn't have a chance to win the meet," Capriotti said. "But we did, and we still might get it done."

The nine competitors Capriotti will send to the starting line in an attempt to win the crown include Russell, Janet Treiber, Paulette Staats, Martha Pinto, Jeanene Rugan, Lesley Wells, Jennifer Hillier, Janet Magner and Amy Marx. Russell had a brief insight as to how she and her teammates might "get it done."

"The key for us is definitely running

Members of the women's cross country team run through slush and snow Thursday afternoon during a team practice. The men's and women's teams will be traveling to the University of Kansas Saturday to compete in the Big Eight Cross Country Championships.

a team race," she said. "For us to run like that even gives us more confidence. It gives us such a boost. We've been working on doing things that way ever since Wichita."

The meet in Wichita that opened the cross country season seems like it was a year ago, Capriotti and Russell admit. But what's happened since then has been upbeat, Russell said.

"A lot of the credit has to go to Coach Capriotti," Russell said. "He has been training us so smart this year. 'We've still got a lot of great things to do, great races still to run.'"

Capriotti said the KU, Nebraska and Iowa State women will all challenge the Cats for the crown.

And Russell said she and her teammates have bought into that theory recently.

"I agree with what Coach said. Any one of four teams could win," she said. "At first, we were saying 'Yea, let's beat KU.'"

"But we've decided since that we don't need to focus on them. We need to focus on our effort."

That would seem to be the approach taken by the K-State men as well. Capriotti and senior leader Todd Trask said the team is focused on doing great things in the postseason, though coach and competitor differ somewhat in opinion as to what might lie in store this weekend.

Trask said he believes the Cats can challenge Iowa State.

"I think we can push Iowa State," he said. "We've got a good shot of doing that. At the least, I think we'll take second place really handily."

That's the point at which Capriotti and Trask veer from one another.

Trask, who admittedly isn't as brash as a year ago, said he believes KU has improved recently, but that Iowa State and K-State are a cut above the rest in men's competition.

Capriotti wasn't quite ready to say that.

"I'm really happy that Todd believes we can push Iowa State," he said. "But they're so good up front that we'd have to run faster and better than ever before."

Scholarly runners

Seven K-State cross country athletes were selected as members of the Academic all-Big Eight Team Wednesday. The team recognizes regular competitors who have posted a minimum 3.0 grade point average either cumulative or in the previous academic year.

Renee Russell, senior, elementary education
Jason Goertzen, senior, accounting

Honorable mention

Ron Smith, senior, history
Jennifer Hillier, senior, elementary education
Janet Magner, sophomore, chemical engineering
Amy Marx, sophomore, undecided

"And with regard to our being up there with Iowa State above everyone else, I'm not so sure. Kansas, Colorado and K-State are all right there for second."

Trask based his statements on a belief that several K-State runners are exceeding expectations, despite the team's loss of No. 2 runner Phil Byrne.

"We've got Mike Becker and Anthony Williams, who are running great, and Billy Wuggazer, who's been super as a freshman," Trask said.

"Everybody's training really well."

'Almost' doesn't cut it

Players want better when Cats travel to Oklahoma

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

Enough of the horseshoes and hand grenades. K-State is tired of near misses.

A win would be nice. "It's gratifying to know that we're slowing people down now," junior linebacker Brent Venables said. "But we've got to be able to find a way to win games when we do that."

The Wildcats have a couple of pretty good excuses for their last two losses. Nebraska and Colorado, the teams that provided the heartaches, will meet Saturday in Boulder, Colo., in a game that will carry plenty of weight in deciding the Big Eight champion.

But K-State's matchup with Oklahoma Saturday could have been for the same reward. And the Cats know it.

"There's no doubt that our expectations are at a different level," senior cornerback Rogerick Green said. "But if we lose, it doesn't matter what else we do. It's not good enough."

Words like that in early September would have earned plenty of weird looks. Back then, K-State was struggling to beat a middle-of-the-road Division I-AA team.

After setbacks to the Cornhuskers and Buffaloes by a combined total of 17 points, nothing seems out of reach. "We're going to win of these big games," quarterback Paul Watson said after last week's 10-0 loss to the Buffaloes. "These are too close for us not to win one of them."

One of K-State coach Bill Snyder's concerns is the toll that consecutive defeats to nationally ranked teams has taken on the Cats. The Sooners, ranked 20th in the latest Associated Press Game time: 1 p.m.

Place: Owen Field (75,004), Norman, Okla.
Radio: Wildcat Radio Network (WIBW 580-AM, flagship); Mitch Holthus, Stan Weber, Dan Ballou Season records: K-State 4-3, 1-2 in Big 8, Oklahoma 5-2, 2-1.
Series record: Oklahoma leads 61-11-4
Notes: OU tailback Earnest Williams quit the team before last week's game with KU, citing a lack of playing time as his reason. The Sooners are sixth in the nation in rushing defense (88.4 yards per game) and seventh in pass defense (93.0). K-State has not defeated Oklahoma since a 19-14 win at Norman in 1970.

Top 25 poll, will be the final opponent in a nasty trilogy of games.

"We've played some emotionally draining games, ones that are difficult to overcome," Snyder said. "All losses are difficult, and these in particular have been because we were in a position to control the outcome of each one."

It's that fact that has the Cats excited about playing the Sooners, a team K-State hasn't beaten in 20 straight meetings. During that time, OU has averaged 45 points per game.

"I don't think the total respect is there because we didn't beat Nebraska or Colorado," Green said. "But it's on the way."

Word of the improved Cats has made its way to Norman, however, as Oklahoma coach Gary Gibbs has studied films.

"It is the best K-State team I have seen in many years," Gibbs said.

"I'm sure they feel they can win against us. Obviously, we cannot afford a letdown."

The Sooners may have already hit rock bottom for this season. After winning their first four games, Oklahoma was beaten by Texas and Colorado in consecutive weeks.

Memories of Gomer Jones, the unsuccessful follower to legendary OU coach Bud Wilkinson in the 1960s, were rekindled. Fans blasted Gibbs on radio talk shows, letting him know they wanted former coach Barry Switzer back to lead Oklahoma.

All the Sooners did after that was put a dent in KU's postseason bowl hopes, pounding the Jayhawks 41-3 last week.

"I think we showed what we can do as an offensive team against Kansas," Oklahoma receiver Ted Long said. "If we play well and don't make mistakes, we can dominate people."

Oklahoma's defense isn't too bad, either. The Sooners are 11th in the nation in total defense and have allowed just 13.6 points per game.

It's a group that adds to the list of Snyder's concerns.

"They appear to be among the finest in the country, and it's easy to see why," Snyder said. "They return an awful lot of people. It will be a big hurdle for us."

Clock ticks fast against spikers

Cats must win remaining games to reach tourney

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

Midnight is fast approaching for the K-State volleyball team.

Actually, it's four before midnight — four matches until the Big Eight Tournament.

The Wildcats have to win all of their remaining contests in order to qualify for the postseason tournament Nov. 29 at Omaha.

The first step for the spikers is to beat Iowa State. The Cats are playing the Cyclones Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

To accomplish their goal, the Cats went through a week of preparation for their second meeting with the Cyclones.

"It was a good week of practice," K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "We worked on our transition skills the last four days. It needed to be quicker and more consistent. We also worked on trying to score more points. I am happy with the sideout part of our game, but we have to score better."

Hagemeyer said the Cats have maintained their focus.

"We prepared the whole week like we are going to win," she said. "Every match is a critical match. I don't think one game is more important than the other. We have to start with the first match and we have to do it now."

Senior Rhonda Hughes said she is optimistic for the remaining matches.

"We have to beat all teams," she said after the loss to Colorado last Saturday. "But I think the team can win every match. We just have to."

Hagemeyer said she expects her team to play better against Iowa State, which is 11-9 overall and 3-4 in Big Eight play. The Cyclones won the first meeting in three games.

"We just need to improve our game all around," Hagemeyer said. "We have to be able to perform each skill, each portion of the game the best we can and the way we are supposed to."

"If we don't do it, we don't come up with a win. But if we do, then I think we can beat anybody."

The Cyclones, which play host to the University of Kansas on Friday before their match with K-State, are not as strong as expected before the season. After losing its first match to KU and twice to Colorado, Iowa State has to fight to earn one of the four spots for the tournament. Iowa State's goal is to pass Colorado this season is already out of reach.

In the first match between the two teams, the Cyclones committed fewer errors to get the win. K-State recorded more kills and digs than Iowa State.

"We started our new Big Eight season after we played every team once," Hagemeyer said. "Now, I expect us to play better against them than we did last time."

Hileman takes national position

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

A K-State student has been chosen for the highest title in Golden Key National Honor Society.

Beth Hileman, senior in industrial engineering, was selected as the National Golden Key National Student Representative at the group's national conference in Atlanta, Ga.

Golden Key is a student organization that recognizes and encourages excellence in undergraduate study. Membership is offered to the top 15 percent of junior and senior classes. There are 168 chapters nationwide.

Hileman will be the only student on the National Council of the Society. The rest of the council is comprised of a president, vice president and secretary, who are members of a university faculty.

Hileman was inducted as a member of Golden Key two years ago and served K-State's chapter as the corresponding secretary in 1990. After her term ended, she decided to stay involved in Golden Key by attending monthly chapter meetings and national conferences. Because of her involvement and interest in the organization, she decided to run for office.

To be eligible for office, Hileman completed a nine-page application stating her goals, position and how her goals would fit into her role as the representative.

K-Staters give newsroom a facelift

Interior architecture students bring Capital-Journal offices out of the '60s

KARREY BRITT
Collegian Reporter

Thirty-seven interior architecture students are working on an eight-week program of redesigning the Topeka Capital-Journal's newsroom to update the furnishings and equipment, which date from the 1960s.

"Nothing has been done for 30 years," said Lisa Sandmeyer, committee chairwoman and Capital-Journal wire editor. "The walls still have their original paint."

Sandmeyer said they decided to redo the newsroom for health reasons.

"The staff has been going to chiropractors because of back problems caused from the outdated chairs," she said.

"There is also no space for yourself, so by the end of the day, I am completely exhausted. Everyone is extremely uncomfortable, so we definitely need this done to keep us healthy."

Fayez Hussein, associate professor of interior architecture, said the newsroom has not been touched since 1963.

"It is way overdue for a change. We saw it ourselves," Hussein said.

The students have to analyze the existing conditions and facilities and take inventory of fixtures, equipment and drawings of existing building space for the purposes of programming.

"We are leaving the project completely up to them," Sandmeyer said. "Their ideas will be completely fresh. We didn't give them any specific color to go by or anything. However, we would like to see more private office space."

Students are supposed to improve communication between the newspaper's various departments, better control public entry and modify or resolve the newsroom's sound- and sun-control problems.

New layout should include all furniture and fixtures. Finishes and color scheme need to be selected, including floor coverings, wall coverings and coatings, ceiling systems, lighting, electrical support systems, all work surfaces and seating.

Capital-Journal is paying all the expenses for the project along with promoting K-State's interior architecture program by printing an article on their work.

Visiting the Collegian newsroom was the students' first step in the project. The tour gave them an idea of how a newsroom works and how it is set up.

Next, they toured the Capital-Journal newsroom to see their specific conditions. While there, they formed teams to interview people from various departments. The students also gathered information on a one-to-one basis about the each person's likes and dislikes.

The third stage was to take inventory of equipment such as computers and files. One team of students worked on the history of the newsroom.

The students organized that information to create a more efficient newsroom by cutting down on the wasted areas.

Each student has been assigned one area of the newsroom to redesign. Each student is required to have a final presentation board along with an exact final model.

"It is a complicated process because there is a lot of information to sort out," said Amy Smith, senior in interior architecture. "It's hard to suit the needs for everybody who works there."

The students are using their research and ideas to create study models, which illustrated a clear analysis of the space available and the process of the newsroom. Students used computers to show the percentage of existing space.

They made a functional diagram of the newsroom, which shows the number of individual people, their names and in which departments they work. Most importantly, these help them establish how the departments interact with each other.

Their first review and critique with members of the Capital-Journal staff was Oct. 30.

"Five members and the executive editor visited us yesterday," Hussein said. "They were very pleased with our progress. They gave us lots of feedback and new ideas to work with."

O Vertigo Danse
Saturday, November 2, 8 p.m.

Montreal's hottest choreographer, Ginette Laurin, has won over audiences and wowed critics with her fresh, dynamic approach; the almost acrobatic virtuosity of her sharply individual dancers; and the theatricality of her original, entertaining performance.

Join her as she takes the sevens of O Vertigo Danse into a twilight of illusion. Over these restless wanderers appear and give rise to a dance that is the commonplace into a fantasy.

"Train d'enfer (Broken Wings) is a hundred miles of rolling stock crowded with dancers." (The Globe and Mail, Toronto)

Civil rights bill may encourage lawsuits

Case decisions may change if bill passes, sides agree

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In the battle over a new civil rights law, lawyers for both workers and employers agree on at least two points.

The bill nearing enactment will encourage new discrimination suits and bring big changes in the way they are decided.

"It's monumental," said Kerry Scanlon, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "It will provide an incentive for people to start bringing these cases again and provide protection on the job that hasn't been there for the last two years."

"You're just going to have more and more lawsuits," said Larry Lorber, an employment lawyer who represents corporations. "There's an enormous incentive for these types of problems to be promoted into a federal case."

The civil rights bill, which the Senate passed overwhelmingly Wednesday and which President Bush has promised to sign, has been caught up in two years of politically charged debate over quotas and racial politics.

For lawyers who handle job discrimination cases, however, the quota debate had little to do with the substantial legal changes that the complex and lengthy legislation will bring both to the workplace and the courtroom.

The legislation had its genesis in a series of Supreme Court decisions in 1989 that, cumulatively and individually, made it more difficult for plaintiffs to win suits charging discrimination in hiring and promotions.

The bill would not only overcome those court decisions but would go beyond to establish significant new employment laws, according to attorneys on both sides of the debate.

Importantly, the legislation establishes the right to jury trials in job discrimination cases brought under the previous landmark act, the Civil Rights Act of 1964. And it establishes that compensatory damages may be awarded, not only in racial discrimination cases where they have been permitted under a Reconstruction-era law, but in cases of sexual, age and religious discrimination.

In those areas, plaintiffs until now have been limited to receive only back pay.

The bill includes limits, or "caps," on those damages of $50,000 for the smallest companies to $300,000 for the largest. Those caps are opposed by women's groups and many liberals, who promise to file new legislation to lift them.

But even those limited damages create new incentives to sue, in the view of lawyers for employers. They are "the pot at the end of the rainbow," in the words of Lorber, who is outside counsel to the Business Roundtable, a group of the nation's biggest corporations.

The effects may be seen on existing cases, too. Although the bill says its provisions are effective upon enactment, lawyers on both sides of the issue agree that courts will have to decide in each case whether pending matters and those still on appeal will be decided under the new law.

KD ROBIN, It went from Amigo's to Sturpee runs. After May, we'll run the mile. Thanks for making my last semester fun. AOT, Lori.

KD SALLIE—Whether the noise be a ghost, bird-call or talk of the shire, or knocking things off the wall on the phone line, I don't mind in fact I state, that you're my favorite roommate!

KD SHAN & Carol, Here's to cover up and ice packs. Love you both! AOT Ness.

KD SUSAN—Between figuring out the guys and the answering machine, we always find time to have fun! Thanks for being so sweet, your roommate, Heba.

KD SUSANNE—You're the best mom! Thanks for helping me and being my friend. Love —Mish.

KD SUZ—Colorado still calling or should we trip across town? Your roommate—Mish. P.S. Why do you wear that ATO Sweatshirt?

KDs DASHANE and Tar-Tar—I Live with an Eskimo I hardly see and a girl who could be Sandra Dee. With little space to move around, things are always left unbound. But it's Kosh. —Brooks.

KDs KRISTA & Foote—You two are great roomies and now that we've reorganized the room, I can actually find my crutches! Love & AOT, Susanne.

KDs K.T. & Melissa, Here's to half a semester of a trashy room. I promise to clean my half soon. P.S. Whose turn is it to vacuum? Love and AOT, Ari.

KDs NESS & Rocky, You are two of the best roomies. Thanks for everything. Especially the advice on men. I've got the right one now. Love & AOT, KD Carol.

KD VANESSA & Carol: To the women of 1/4 Black eyes, bruises and much more! Hey ladies, no need to fret—We haven't signed with Kappa Sigma yet. AOT Shelli.

LAURA S. I've known you less than a year, but you got me through school. You are great. Happy Birthday.

MAO—It's been 3 years, but it feels like only 3 weeks and I love you more now than I did when I met you. You've given me love, friendship, compassion and care... but no nub (until July 16) and I love and respect you for it. Dan.

trees have not lost all of their leaves, which gives them more surface area that ice can form on," she said.

Across Manhattan, the tree limbs that were weighted down by coats of ice fell on power lines causing power outages.

"The rain started to build up on the tree limbs and had caused some problems. Then it started to warm up and most of the ice melted, but now it's starting to accumulate again," said John Johannes, division manager of Kansas Power and Light.

Royal Towers Apartments, 1700 N. Manhattan Ave., were temporarily out of service during the afternoon because of a short in an underground primary. The cause was probably moisture and temperature related, Johannes said.

"If the rain doesn't stop, there will definitely be more problems," he said. "If the temperature stays between 28 and 38 degrees it will be a difficult night, but if it gets cold and starts to snow there won't be nearly as much trouble."

Later Thursday evening outages were still being reported throughout Manhattan. Marvin Rodriguez, KP&L marketing representative who was on call during the evening, said the outages were scattered throughout the city.

"Some come up and then go down again. Once we get one line back up, another one somewhere else goes down," he said.

Rodriguez said it was hard to say how many outages there were and how long they had been out of power.

Johannes said KP&L crews were trying to get to the affected areas as quickly as possible, but a backlog was created because of the large number of calls. Crews from Hutchinson and Junction City were called to help, he said.

"We're getting to them as fast as we can. We're working on the biggest problems first and are going from there," he said.

Lt. John Doehling, shift commander for the Riley County Police Department, said normally the department does not increase its shift size for bad weather. Instead, officers are asked to come in earlier or work later to handle the increase in calls.

Last night, Doehling said the calls were already increasing.

"We've had an increase in traffic accidents. That generally always happens," Doehling said. "This is probably the worst kind of weather to deal with because you have all of this moisture."

Doehling said he thought the worst time for accidents would be this morning, after the night's colder temperatures refroze the slush on the streets.

"If the weather is really bad, we make an announcement over radio that if you're involved in a minor accident with no injuries, to exchange driver information and make arrangements to report the accident at a later time," he said.

Doehling said there may have been less accidents Thursday than normally seen during bad weather.

"I think that's because people are staying home," he said.

The city crew was trying to prevent accidents by clearing the streets of slush and ice.

Jim Pearson, assistant city manager of Manhattan, said crews were working at 3 a.m. Thursday morning.

"We had a lot of sand down on the intersections by morning," Pearson said.

He said the main problem the crews were having was getting the water to drain from the streets.

"When it changed from freezing rain to rain, there wasn't anywhere for the water to go," he said.

The slush blocked the drainage of water into the storm sewers. He said the city is using its full crew plus addition workers from the Parks and Recreation department.

"We're having some problems with water lines freezing and water-line breaks," Pearson said. "We've managed to keep the airport open most of the day."

Many of the employees in the city offices were sent home at lunchtime. "All of our non-essential personnel have been turned loose," he said.

The towing services in Manhattan were also busier because of the weather. Mike Oppy, owner of Mike's Wrecker, said his business increased as early as Thursday morning.

Oppy said his service calls involved mostly jump-starts and minor accidents.

recent memory, though Dan Saleaumua has fallen off in performance somewhat. Neil Smith is, simply, a superstar in waiting. Grade: B. Projection: If Saleaumua wakes up, look out offenses.

Linebackers — Derrick Thomas has been the second-best KC linebacker this year. Chris Martin has outplayed his more-heralded mate, though he's just begun to get the press he deserves. Grade: B. Projection: If Thomas gets it cranked up, this unit will be the NFL's best — not just one of them.

Secondary — I only wish this group had been healthy. With Kevin Ross, Albert Lewis, Deron Cherry and Kevin Porter all on the field at once, this is one of the three best units in the league. Unfortunately, they haven't been out there together much. Thus ... Grade: B-. Projection: Healthy d-backs would make a huge difference. Flame-retardant defensive gear must go.

Overall — KC has four games of the remaining seven on its schedule that it should win, and another three that it could. Yep, this crew could go 13-3 or it could finish as low as 10-6. So far, however, the offense and the defense haven't been able to click together in the same game. Grade: B. Projection: If the team is able to come together in the second half of the season, the Chiefs could become one of the league's elite.

Granted, the more famous a guitar player is, the more obnoxious a face with which he or she can get away. One need not be famous, however to get away with it.

Take Dr. Zeus axman Andy Crow, who looks just the way his description suggests — like an ax-toting murderer. With teeth bared and crazed eyes peering through a fringed curtain of hair, Crow grinds through his show like a true metal maniac.

Cory Garcia of the now-defunct Heat from Hays had a doozy. Staring straight ahead as in a trance, his tongue always found its way to the left-hand corner of his mouth.

What is it in our social structure that differentiates between cool and uncool? Somewhere in the complex power plant of our brains is a Supreme Court of social acceptance. It is acceptable for rock musicians to do these things, but try to imagine your dad mowing the lawn giving his best Whitesnake pout to the neighbors across the street.

I guess the ability to look like a dork and be worshiped for it is just another point on the long list of advantages of being a member of the rich and famous, as well as the gifted artistic types.

baseball card. Other purchases include a photo of Elvis, a vase, a carnival-glass lamp shade — at unbelievable prices, no less.

Yes, the prices are unbelievable, but Mr. Gaunt does not deal strictly in cash. Part of the bargain involves doing "favors" for Gaunt, and it is these favors that keep the action rollicking in the hilarious, irreverent and entertaining story.

It does not take the reader long to realize Gaunt is not a normal businessman. In fact, he is the devil himself. These favors he talks the citizens of Castle Rock into performing for him amount to selling their souls, and that is done at a very high price.

All these favors culminate in a crazy, funny ending that leaves the poor town a shambles with fireworks of every kind on every corner.

The introduction and ending borrow from the style of Ring Lardner's classic story, "Haircut," introducing the stranger to the happening of his town. The scariest part of the book might be in the final chapter. Even after being defeated in a supernatural battle with Sheriff Pangborn, the ending echoes the beginning — with Satan setting up shop in a new town. It could happen in your town, King is saying, because greed and weakness are everywhere.

"Needful Things" brings black humor to a new high — even the frenzied violence and anarchy of the final explosion offers a few yuks. It's a difficult thing to pull off, but nobody can do it quite as well as Stephen King.

Soldiers charged in Milford murder

Anonymous tip leads to arrests in Sept. 20 slaying of K-State student

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

JUNCTION CITY — Two Fort Riley soldiers were arrested Friday evening and charged for the Sept. 20 slaying of K-State sophomore Catherine Heintze at a convenience store where she worked.

Jason Lee Turner, 20, HHB 1/5 FA Fort Riley, is charged with felony murder, attempted aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery.

Nathaniel Wayne Ellibee, 19, HHB 1/5 FA Fort Riley, is charged with aiding and abetting felony murder, aiding and abetting attempted aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery.

The conspiracy charges mean that the crime committed at Pate's Convenience Store in Milford was premeditated.

Both Ellibee and Turner will make their first appearance in District Court Monday morning to be assigned attorneys.

Store owner Pate Willingham said Turner and Ellibee had probably been in his store before.

"I am familiar with their names but can't put a face to them," he said. "I had their names on a bad check list."

Turner and Ellibee are both being held on $100,000 bond and in custody at separate locations at the request of Ellibee.

Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said Turner is in custody at the Geary County Detention Center but would not release Ellibee's location. Deppish said Ellibee was located somewhere out of Geary County's jurisdiction.

"The first subject apprehended is scared of the other one," he said.

Deppish said the subjects were interviewed and confessed to the crime separately.

"Their stories match up," he said. "They confessed reasonably easily."

Detective Lt. Albert Buskey said the suspects' attorneys would probably try to claim the confessions were obtained illegally.

"They'll say they're inadmissible. That's a standard defense technique, but we're confident they will be upheld," he said.

Although Deppish said the charges against the two will most likely not change, he said reducing or dropping charges is the court's decision.

The Geary County Sheriff's Department called a press conference Saturday morning to announce the arrests.

Deppish said his office received a tip from a man who requested anonymity Thursday evening.

"He was told the circumstances and he told us," Deppish said. "It was information no one else could have known unless they had been there (at the scene of the crime) or told by someone who had."

Deppish said the man did not come forward earlier because he was scared for his life and his family's well-being.

Buskey said after receiving the tip, it was arranged for Ellibee to be brought from his Fort Riley residence to the Fort Riley Criminal Investigation Division office for questioning at 8:30 p.m. Ellibee was then arrested without incident.

Through information gathered in the Ellibee interview, a search warrant was granted.

Buskey said quite a few officers then raided Turner's mobile home in Milford at 9:45 p.m. and arrested him without any problems.

"We didn't know if they were armed or not," he said. "We did recover some weapons, but they (Turner and his wife) were in bed."

Officers said it was unknown whether or not Turner's wife knew of Harsh weather causes accidents

Recent conditions have prompted uncontrollable driving

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

Although there has been a sudden drop in temperatures recently, Manhattan has adapted rather quickly to the new, harsh weather conditions. The biggest problems were caused by slippery driving conditions.

"People are not accustomed to driving on an ice shield. We had quite a number of accidents," said Sergeant Adam Angst of the Riley County Police Department. "We had more accidents than usual, but we didn't have more accidents than we expected with this weather."

Angst said lots of events, mainly athletic, had been canceled due to the weather conditions.

Assistant City Manager James Pearson said the city cleaned up the streets before the weekend started, but

Sexual harassment common

Survey says 60 percent of women report unwanted incidents at work

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Sixty percent of women who responded to a survey reported unwanted sexual harassment at work one or more times in a two-year period.

Jean White, graduate student in adult, occupational and continuing education, conducted the survey for her Ph.D. dissertation. She found that two of five women said they had been sexually harassed in the workplace between one and 10 times, and one of five women had been sexually harassed between 11 and 27 times.

The survey was mailed to a random sample of 300 women in Topeka, and 230 were returned complete enough to use in the study.

Of the 230 women surveyed, White said 80 percent had permanent, full-time day jobs and were evenly divided between black, white and Hispanic women.

White said sexual harassment does not affect all women in the same way. She said black, white and Hispanic women differed in their perceptions of sexual harassment.

Black women surveyed perceived pressure for sexual favors as a form of sexual harassment, she said, while white women considered sexual looks as sexual harassment.

Betsy Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies, helped White with her research and said the number of incidents of sexual harassment also varied between the women of different ethnicities.

"We found that single black women reported significantly more incidents of sexual harassment than did married, divorced or widowed women of any race," Bergen said. "But when you add all those groups together, the Hispanic women reported significantly more incidents of sexual harassment than did Caucasian or black women."

White said men tend to sexually harass women who are younger and less educated than themselves. Based on her research, she said, sexual harassment is primarily a male expression of power because they have higher status in the workplace.

Peer AIDS educators spread the message

Students teach other students the causes, signs and symptoms

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Each semester, peer AIDS educators make the rounds of residence halls and greek houses to teach their fellow students about AIDS and safe sex.

Trained by Lafene Health Center, Health Educators Cindy Burke and Reita Currie, said peer AIDS educators give students the facts about the disease — how it is transmitted and its signs and symptoms.

Currie said although students have become more knowledgeable about AIDS in recent years, they still feel, on the whole, it is not going to affect them personally.

"College students believe they are invincible, indestructible," Currie said.

While it is important for students to understand the nuts and bolts of the disease, in order to really have an effect, they have to consider it on an emotional level, Currie said.

Burke said it is not enough to say there are 500 cases in Kansas.

"You have to hit 'em between the eyes and say, 'Hey, it's here.'"

She said she tells students that three faculty members have already died of AIDS, and there are students on campus now who have the virus.

"We diagnosed our first student here in 1985," she said.

Currie said peer AIDS educators use a videotape to help reach students on an emotional level.

The video shows what happens when a student who doesn't know he has been infected passes the virus on to his partner. His partner must then go through the agony of being tested and finding out the test is positive.

Kathy Grimes, senior in psychology, saw the video when peer AIDS educators visited her sorority.

Grimes said the video was depressing and emotional, and made her realize that it could happen to anyone — even an average college student.

"She represented any of us," Grimes said. "It only took one experience — and she totally trusted the guy — it never crossed her mind that something like this could happen."

Currie said the purpose of the film is to make students stop and think about what behaviors they are engaging in that could put them at risk for the disease.

"This disease is not something that's contagious, that you can just catch as you're walking by," she said. "You have to practice some type of behavior usually in order to get the disease."

Marisa Larson, junior in political science and peer AIDS educator, said one technique she uses to get this message across is to have students hold up cards with various sexual practices written on them.

Students are then asked to rate them from the lowest to the highest risk behavior with the least dangerous being abstinence and the highest being unprotected sex with multiple partners.

As part of their discussion on safe sex, peer AIDS educators hand out condoms and use a banana to demonstrate how to use them.

Larson said she was nervous at first about presenting such a touchy subject, but the feedback from students has been positive.

"People are not shunning us," she said. "They really listen, and I feel like the program is really having an impact."

Larson said she became a peer AIDS educator because she came from a medical background and she wanted to do what she could to help people understand the disease.

"I want to inform people about how it is transmitted so they won't discriminate against those who already have it," she said.

The program is entering its third year at K-State. Burke received $5,000 in educational opportunity funds this year through the Student Governing Association to hire its student coordinators.

CAMPUS

Prominent leaders set to speak this week

Many well-known Kansas leaders will speak and answer questions today through Friday for the Blue Key-sponsored Leadership Week in the Union Big 8 Room.

The week will conclude Saturday with a Residence Hall Leadership Conference.

Presentations by such speakers as former Kansas Gov. John Carlin, Secretary of State Bill Graves and University President Jon Wefald will cover a variety of leadership areas, including international, statewide and multicultural positions.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life and Blue Key adviser, said one of the week's biggest highlights will be the chance for students to speak personally with the leaders during the question-and-answer sessions.

"How many times does a student get a chance to have a dialogue with a former governor?" Franklin said.

He said leadership training is more of a deliberate process than in the past, and speaking to present leaders helps students learn how to become leaders more quickly.

Darren Klish, senior in biochemistry and Leadership Week co-chairman, said he considered each presentation worthwhile, but he hoped students would attend at least one each day.

"We're very excited, and we hope the students are as excited as we are," Klish said.

Icy weather spooks would-be vandals

Crime lost out to the weather this Halloween as the near-freezing temperatures scared many would-be vandals back into their homes.

Investigator Richard Herrman of the K-State Police said the complaint and crime rate was down this year from past Halloweens. He said he thinks it was due to the cold weather.

He also said he feels society's beliefs are changing and contributing to a safer atmosphere.

"There was more emphasis on having fun and safe activities this year," Herrman said. "Society is becoming more value-conscious."

Buddy Mays, watch two supervisor with the Riley County Police Department, said fewer people were driving this year, but there were more accidents because of the weather. He said although the volume of accidents was up, the complaint list was down.

"The crime rate seems to get better every year," Mays said. "Everyone was busy fighting the weather this year."

Teams prepare for American Royal show

The Department of Animal Sciences and Industry's Livestock and Meats Judging Teams are going to Kansas City, Mo., for the 61st Annual American Royal Livestock and Horse Show, Nov. 8-23.

Brian Dunn, junior in animal sciences and industry and meats team member, said contest preparation in the form of practice sessions, or "workouts," has been going on since before the fall semester began.

"We started workouts a week before school started and now have continued the regular workouts," he said. "But now, we will be concentrating specifically on the American Royal Contest."

John Unruh, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry and meats team coach, said the American Royal is one of the most prestigious contests for the team to enter. Last year, the K-State team finished third overall, and Unruh said this year's team is also extremely competitive.

"Success is not necessarily measured by the placing but the team members' personal improvement and goal achievement in meats judging," Unruh said.

Another area of K-State involvement at the 1991 American Royal is the Student Ambassador program, which replaced the American Royal Queen competition in 1988. One female and one male are chosen to promote the American Royal and the agricultural industry in media, civic and business groups and student and youth organizations, said Ambassador Candidate Sandy Goering, junior in agricultural economics and food science.

John Niemann, junior in agribusiness and newly elected K-State agriculture ambassador, is Kansas' male candidate in the American Royal Ambassador competition. He said the difference between the two ambassador programs is the time factor.

"Even though the ambassadors must be available to do some promotional activities throughout the year," he said, "the main responsibilities of the American Royal Ambassadors are working at the American Royal the next week after they are selected and coming back the following year to help with the Royal's promotion."

Several students will also be exhibiting livestock, and faculty and staff members are helping organize youth livestock shows.

At 6:07 p.m., a non-injury accident occurred at 11th and Ratone streets. Drivers of the vehicles were Jennifer Modick, 1807 Todd Road, and Jan E. Dolezal, 1205 Ratone St. A major-damage, non-injury accident report was filed.

At 9:12 p.m., Meredith M. Clopton, No. 3 Evergreen Estates, Ogden, was issued a notice to appear for gas theft at Shop Quik, 529 Richards St. A juvenile detention report was filed and subject was released to an aunt.

At 9:15 p.m., Chad G. Leonard, Rural Route 1 Box 214, Hoyt, was issued a notice to appear for minor in possession of a cereal malt beverage in a drinking establishment. A report was filed.

At 10:41 p.m., Raymond D. Holmes, 601 Yuma No. 3, was arrested for domestic battery. Subject was confined in lieu of $500 bond and a report was filed.

At 11:15 p.m., Steven J. Lacey, 906 Colorado St., filed a burglary report. Total loss was $532 including $50 damage to a window.

SUNDAY

At 11:07 a.m., a hit-and-run accident was reported by Teresa Mann, 11550 Highway 24. A minor-damage report was filed.

At 12:53 a.m., Jeffrey A. Williams, HMC 3/37 Arm, Fort Riley, was arrested for DUI and issued a notice to appear for possession of a suspended drivers license. A report was filed and subject was released on $500 bond.

At 1:04 a.m., Randolph Houston III, Rural Route 1 Box 359, Oak City, NC, was arrested for DUI. A report was filed.

At 2:39 a.m., Jeffrey J. Forkenbrock, 1817 Rockhill Road, was arrested for DUI. Subject was released on a $500 bond and a report was filed.

Up in smoke

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

K-State campus police officer Tim Schrag throws snow onto a flaming Chevrolet Cavalier while waiting for the Manhattan Fire Department to arrive Friday afternoon in the parking lot at the corner of Mid-Campus Drive and Claflin streets. Schrag went for the snow after he exhausted his fire extinguisher battling the blaze. According to Lei Gong, owner of the vehicle, smoke began to pour out of the steering column and from underneath the hood when she started the car. Seeing the smoke and eventual flames, a friend rushed to Gong's aide, raised the hood and disconnected the battery to no avail. The flames went on to consume the interior of the car but caused neither explosions nor injuries.

Perez runs as write-in

New candidate decided last Friday night to join the race

ULRIKE DAUER
Staff Writer

Friday night may have been fun and games for many people, but for Luis Perez, it was quite serious. Almost at the last minute, Friday night, he decided to run as a write-in candidate for student body president.

Perez, a senior in political science and Latin American studies, said he was encouraged to run earlier last week by one of the University administrators. After Tuesday's meeting of the Educational Opportunity Fund committee, Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement, suggested he run for student body president. Perez and Bosco are both members of the EOF committee, which allocates funding and scholarships to underrepresented students on campus.

Perez said he thought about it over the week and decided to run because none of the candidates had made diversity an issue yet. He said he wants to bring more cultural and residential diversity into student government.

"Students come with academic and living interests to K-State. Student government currently represents only the academic interest because senators are only elected by college," he said. "I'd like to see residents' interest, on and off campus, represented in student government."

He said he wants to get both students who live on and off campus involved in student government.

Perez also wants to encourage cultural diversity in student government. He said he wants to bring in more cultures currently underrepresented in the students' administration. This includes African-Americans, Asian-Americans, Hispanic-Americans, Native-Americans and international students. He said many students who belong to those groups are interested in student issues but discouraged by the Senate's composition to apply for a seat.

"I want to encourage them to participate in student government and to see they can make a difference," he said.

Perez does not have much time left for his campaign with five days between his decision to run and the election day Wednesday. But despite his late decision, he said he is confident he can do an excellent job.

"And I have quite a few supporters," he said. "I have several speaking engagements, and I am working on my campaign all night."

He said his whole campaign will be self-financed by his savings and different groups who are willing to lend support.

Perez had luck on his side. The elections committee extended important deadlines because of the weather.

"Because of the poor weather we decided to extend the deadlines for the second student body president expenditure report, and the one and only student senate candidate and board of student publications candidate expenditure reports until Monday," said Ann Woodbury, chairwoman of the Senate elections committee and a junior in business administration.

Troy Thomson, a member of the SGA elections committee and a freshman in pre-medicine, said all students' campaign expenditure reports are due in the SGA office by 5 p.m. Monday. The original deadline for the reports was last Friday, Woodbury said.

Perez said he knows about the application procedures. As a write-in candidate he does not have to hand in a formal application on deadline.

"The election committee chair explained the procedure to me. I don't have to file formally. The only deadline is Monday night," he said.

Arrest

her husband's involvement in the murder.

The murder weapon was not recovered as of the press conference, but Deppish said they would have it in time for the trial.

"We believe we know where it is and expect to produce it for the trial," he said.

Deppish said the murder weapon was an extremely high-powered rifle. "It is not a military weapon, it is a hunting rifle," he said.

Other pieces of physical evidence were confiscated, but Deppish would not elaborate.

He said the Heintze family was notified when the warrants were issued, and they were pleased suspects had been arrested.

Deppish said the motive of the crime was robbery.

"The robbery did not go down because these two became too scared to carry it through," he said.

Deppish described the events which led up to Heintze's murder that began at 9:30 p.m. on Sept. 20 at the convenience store.

"She was asked to turn off the lights of the store to make it appear as if the store was closed. She had one more light switch to turn off, and she tripped the silent alarm. They must have seen the motion, panicked and then shot and killed her. She was shot at close range in the side, back of her head," he said.

Deppish said the robbery was planned and the two subjects parked and waited for the area to clear before attempting the robbery.

"It is possible they were there waiting when Cathy's mother was in the store, and they waited for her to leave," he said. "When the body was discovered by a customer, they were in the immediate area either just clearing the building, or maybe even still in the building."

Deppish would not divulge any information regarding the suspects' transportation the evening of the murder, or say whether the two wore masks.

The Sheriff's office suspected the murder had been done by local resident(s), he said.

"They had to know how the place operated. It's not likely someone would just get off the highway cold and do it," he said.

Deppish also said military personnel were suspected because the highway on which Pate's store is located is highly traveled by the military.

Both Turner and Ellibee served in Saudi Arabia for Operation Desert Storm.

Turner is from Springfield, Oregon, and Ellibee is from Sandpoint, Idaho.

WHY VOTE FOR THE LIBRARY REFERENDUM?

- | | |
|-------------------------|--|
| More Student Services | -guarantees a library student lounge with vending services, facilities for extended hours with security. |
| Now or Never | -if the referendum fails to pass, $5 million in alumni donations may be lost and matching State funding in this decade will be unlikely. |
| No Student Fee Increase | -existing student fees are not increased. Current fees are continued to support the purchase of $5 million in bonds in 1996 if student funds are matched by alumni and State funds. |
| Better Environment | -provides central air conditioning, sofa style seating, quiet study space, and 1,150 additional first-quality study spaces. |
| More Space | -adds 122,250 square feet to Farrell's existing 148,000 square feet. Provides shelf space for 900,000 new volumes. Nearly doubles current size of Farrell. |
| A Science Library | -establishes a central sciences/technology library. |

REFERENDUM

QUESTION & ANSWERS

Question: Why are both the Library and the Rec Complex on the same ballot?

Answer: Both are in need of expansion and renovation. Since both can be funded with NO INCREASE in costs to students, now is the time to vote to re-direct current bond monies to these projects. Both projects must be supported by the students as these are becoming a "now or never" situation.

Question: Will this cost the student more?

Answer: NO! These projects only re-direct current monies being collected and do not increase any fees. This is a very important point to understand--There will be NO INCREASE IN FEES TO DO THESE PROJECTS.

Question: When will these projects start?

Answer: The Rec Complex will start in the Fall of 1992 with completion expected late 1993 or early 1994. The Library fee accumulation begins in the Spring of 1994. Foundation and State contributions must be finalized by 1996 or the student commitment will end.

Question: Should either the Library or the Rec Complex fail, will the money go to the other's project?

Answer: No, not without an entire new referendum being established by Student Senate, with considerable time delays. The "best of both worlds" is now and students must vote yes for both to take advantage of all possibilities.

Question: Why should students pay part of the cost of the library expansion?

Answer: Expansion is critically needed and can not wait for the State to provide full funding. Most new Regents' University structures built in this century will require student/private/federal contributions.

Question: Why is the Rec Complex getting more money for its project than the Library?

Answer: The Library will also receive Foundation and State support. The student contribution is to help show student commitment and to help bring this project to the forefront. The Rec Complex has always been and will continue to be supported by student fees only.

Question: What is needed to pass this referendum?

Answer: Of those students voting, 60% must vote in favor of the project to make it pass.

WHY VOTE FOR THE REC COMPLEX REFERENDUM?

REC COMPLEX

- A MUCH LARGER WEIGHT/FITNESS ROOM--Almost three times larger than current room with area for free weights, machines, a circuit area, and cardiovascular machines.
- AN AEROBIC/MULTI-ACTIVITY ROOM--About the size of two basketball courts for aerobic sessions. Special floor, improved sound system and acoustics.
- FOUR MORE BASKETBALL COURTS
- A LONGER ELEVATED TRACK
- CONVERT CURRENT WEIGHT ROOM TO A TABLE TENNIS ROOM
- AIR CONDITION ENTIRE BUILDING
- RENOVATE SOME AREAS includes re-surfacing gym and racquetball court floors

OUTDOORS

- RE-SURFACE TENNIS COURTS AND UPGRADE LIGHTS
- LIGHT PLAYFIELDS to include four softball fields for night play
- INSTALL UNDERGROUND IRRIGATION FOR PLAYFIELDS

WHERE DOES THE MONEY COME FROM?

This will be accomplished WITHOUT ANY INCREASE IN FEES TO THE STUDENTS. Current monies would be re-directed to this expansion.

TIME OF COMPLETION?

After a successful vote, the State would hire an architect with construction to begin in the fall of 1992. Completion of the additional facilities and opening would be late 1993 or early 1994.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Pillow fight peaceful answer to conflict

As the Middle East peace conference drags on, the fears of many are confirmed. Little has been accomplished as the opposing sides obstinately refuse to make any concessions in the name of peace and humanity.

The United States is there, with a kinder, gentler George Bush leading the way. Since the United States no longer has to worry about where its oil will come from, it is time to bring peace to the region — or, at least, make a good show until Bush is re-elected.

Instead of sitting around posing for photo ops and listening to the rhetoric of Israel vs. the Arab world, Americans should start doing something.

The United States is still a world power, however wanting that power is. Our nation would be well-served to start acting out the parental role it has created for itself.

Especially in light of the present situation, in which most of the countries involved are acting like spoiled children. If they are unwilling to cooperate, then treat them accordingly.

First of all, take away the children's toys — guns, bullets and weapons of mass stupidity. For example, if Israel remains inflexible, take back the Patriot missiles. Come on, instigating a peace conference while arming some of the participants is counter-productive.

Then, when they're all good and seething, lock them in a big room with nothing but pillows in it and let them beat the bejeezus out of each other until they are tired or maybe until they realize how silly they're being.

Then, if they still want to be inflexible, send them to bed without any supper (cut them off, no more aid, period).

More effective steps need to be taken. The present policy is like fighting a fire with gasoline.

Bikers have right to their street, too

It's illegal to park in a traffic lane. But apparently, bike lanes on campus do not qualify as traffic lanes. And campus vehicles can park anywhere they want.

The right of the K-State Police and other service vehicles to park anywhere they can during an emergency situation is not disputed. But seeing these vehicles parked across the bike lanes on campus on a regular basis destroys the service's credibility.

Bike lanes give cyclists a place to ride, so they do not have to attempt to integrate into motor-vehicle traffic. The bike lane is also designed to give bikers a place to ride other than the sidewalk.

In essence, a bike lane is a little highway just for cyclists.

When cyclists ride on the sidewalks, they run the risk of hitting pedestrians and being ticketed. When they ride in the street, it increases the risk of being plowed over by a motorist or incurring the wrath of the same.

When someone parks his or her vehicle in the bike lane, however, the cyclist is left with a tough choice: ride the sidewalk and risk an accident and/or fine, or hit the street.

So those of you driving cars on campus, please leave the bike lane clear. Bikers have just as much right to their street as you do to yours.

YESBond for books provides unique opportunity*RAY KOWALCZEWSKI GUEST

Ray Kowalczewski is a senior in economics.

The Nov. 5 and 6 referendum presents a unique opportunity for K-State students to make a dramatic statement about the quality and future of this University.

The referendum asks K-State students to approve a $9.25 extension of existing student fees to support a $5-million bond issue that will contribute to expansion and renovation of Farrell Library. Matched by $5 million in alumni contributions, a $10-million total non-state package would thus be available to challenge the Kansas Legislature to provide the remaining funds to complete the $27-million project.

Most students understand the necessity to improve Farrell as soon as possible. Farrell provides only one seat for every 25 students, and the environmental quality of the majority of the seats available is very low. Little space remains for shelving new books, and 30 percent of the books are being moved to an off-campus storage facility. Professional consultants last year recommended that Farrell be almost doubled in size.

The benefits of expansion and renovation are numerous.

The most obvious one is that additional space will be provided for books and student seating. With more space, the books can be reorganized into continuous sequences and will thus be less confusing and more accessible to student users.

Expansion and remodeling eliminates the mismatched floors and creates circular traffic flows throughout the building. No longer will students have to "crawl through windows" to move between sections.

Further, an additional 1,150 top-quality study spaces will be added, making the library, once again, the ideal place to study. A student lounge complete with vending services will be installed along with a secure 24-hour study area.

Improvement of air conditioning and heating is part of the plan so that uncomfortable environmental conditions are not experienced by future generations of students. Overall, these improvements will make Farrell Library responsive to its users and the campus community.

With the library expansion referendum, student leaders have issued a challenge to the alumni to match the $5-million student commitment. The first part of that challenge has already been met by an anonymous pledge of $2 million. With the passage of the referendum, we can challenge the state of Kansas to provide the $17 million necessary to complete the project. Students, by their activism and by their willingness to commit their funds, are telling the Legislature they understand the importance of an adequate library to a quality university education. So, let's all send a message to the citizens of Kansas by marking "yes" on the referendum ballot.

Why are students being asked to pay for an academic building when it should be a complete state responsibility? The reality of funding higher education in Kansas in the 1990s is that students are being asked to assume a larger and more direct responsibility for the cost of a university education, including campus building costs. This is the new reality.

The Kansas Board of Regents last April approved Farrell expansion as K-State's No. 1 building priority. The first appropriation is scheduled for 1996. However, one may assume, without the $10-million student and alumni commitment, that funding may slide many years into the future. That is why safeguards have been written into the referendum bill. If state support is not forthcoming in 1996, the student commitment to the library project will end and alumni support may be diverted to other uses.

This is a window of opportunity that will not present itself again. "Now or never" is not too strong a statement.

The children of current K-State students will find Farrell in the same condition when they come to K-State if we do not accept this challenge and support the referendum.

Vote "yes" for Farrell Library expansion.

Improving Farrell should be students' top priorityJOHN RYAN

GUEST

John Ryan is a senior in pre-medicine.

Students are going to have the opportunity Tuesday and Wednesday to show where they really stand. The proposed expansion of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and the upgrade of Farrell Library have been two of the most-talked about issues for the past several years.

Unfortunately, during the last few months the proposed Rec Complex expansion and Farrell Library upgrade have been lumped together as one big issue.

Since the administration didn't accept the students' choice last November, the Rec Complex expansion will be put before students again. This will give students the chance to do what the administration claims students really wanted last year — spend $7.9 million on the Rec.

How many times will the administration put the Rec expansion up for a vote before it accepts the results? The idea is that last year students were holding back from voting for the Rec because they wanted to give money to Farrell. Well, thanks to some clever repackaging, students can pay for both. Better yet, student fees won't have to be raised. Just like buying a new house, payments could be spread out for as many years as necessary so that student fees could eventually pay off this debt.

But how many times will we have bought the Rec expansion in interest payments by the time the last payment is made? I use the Rec Center almost every day and have yet to see any overcrowding that would justify $7.9 million. On the other hand, I have spent many hours in Farrell, frustrated that either they don't have a book or that it was nowhere to be found. Maybe we should ask ourselves, "What is a need, and what is a want?"

How many students are getting less of an education because of Farrell's condition? Which is really our top priority — the Rec is getting $7.9 million, and Farrell is getting $5 million? Think of how much sooner the Farrell addition could be built if we could add the $7.9 million from the Rec to the $5 million already proposed. If we want to send a message to the state, wouldn't it show a much stronger commitment to education by students to give the library our full financial support?

There has been a great deal of talk lately about where financial support for the library is ultimately going to come from. Students have been told if the library referendum does not pass, the library would be in danger of losing several substantial alumni donations. Assuming alumni are holding back donations until they see how important the library is to students, what kind of message would we be sending alumni by giving $7.9 million to the Rec and only $5 million to Farrell Library?

Then there is the idea of state funding for the library. Some people say the state should pick up the rest of the tab that students and alumni cannot raise for the library. Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said the state would then be expected to fund the rest of the project. It is true that the state should make this investment in K-State, but how long have we been waiting for the rest of the Margin of Excellence? How many times have we heard the administration, faculty and other students say the state should be making more of a financial commitment to our future, but isn't?

With the state and the nation experiencing tough financial times, it is reasonable to assume a large increase in state funding is very unlikely in the near future. The future of Farrell Library and K-State rests where it always has — with the students. The important question students must face is not if the library will be expanded, but rather, when?

Students have heard the addition to the library and other necessary improvements are years away. How many graduate students will be lost to our peer institutions because our library cannot compete? How are students to bring in more research grants and continue to become Truman and Rhodes scholars? K-State prides itself on its education, but we must be willing to do what it takes to encourage excellence. When you vote on Nov. 5 or 6, ask yourself if the library is your top priority.

If it is, vote "no" on the expansion of the Rec and "yes" for the essential improvements of Farrell Library.

LETTERColumnist shouldn't pass judgment

Editor,
After reading Tracey Gage's guest column, "Zig zagging priorities," in the Oct. 24 Collegian, I can understand why some people question the idea of freedom of the press. It's been a while since I've read as many self-righteous platitudes, faulty generalizations and prejudicial conclusions as were contained in that article.

Although Ms. Gage claims to not judge people by their priorities, she feels entirely capable of fabricating in her mind just what those priorities might be. And remarkably enough, this is after only a 30-second sales-counter request.

But I forget the other "evidence" — an old junky car, a father's purchase of his daughter's gas and the lighting of a cigarette — certainly enough information to relegate the girl to the ranks of the (probably) unemployed, (probably) uncaring, (probably) unappreciative degenerates. You know, those same people who spend all their money on beer instead of food for their children.

My point here is that, even though she has every right to have them, Ms. Gage should keep her misinformed opinions to herself, especially when they could reflect upon a person's character or worth.

If Ms. Gage truly wants to be righteously indignant about something, she should concentrate on those folks who make judgments about other people based on little or no knowledge. It's called ignorance and prejudice, and if Ms. Gage is in the habit of forming conclusions and opinions like the ones in her article, she should join one of those clubs where they wear white hoods for the meetings. She'd (probably) fit in.

LETTER*Disciples poor example

Editor,
There was something that I noticed at John Rittenhouse's lecture about satanism that I found rather disturbing. It was nothing Rittenhouse said about satanism or occult activity that I found especially troubling. Rather, it was the attitudes expressed by many people in the audience toward Christianity in general that I found alarming.

Many people made condemning comments about Christianity based on the actions of a few so-called Christians. Granted, Christians are not perfect, and there have been numerous incidents in history, such as the Crusades of the 11th, 12th and 13th centuries that were done in the name of Christ, that should be condemned.

However, what really disturbed me was the fact that those who rightly condemned the actions of some so-called Christians seemed to reach the conclusion that all Christians and Jesus Christ himself should be rejected and condemned.

It is prejudiced to judge and condemn Christianity and all Christians based on the actions of a few. What concerns me most, therefore, is the serious mistake some are making when they judge and reject Jesus by the actions of those who claim to be his followers. Unfortunately, sometimes even the best of Jesus' disciples tend to be a poor example of Christ.

Carlin receives mixed responses

ERWIN SEBA
Managing Editor*Editor's note: The following story contains language that may be offensive to some readers.*

The audience was — and wasn't — laughing when the fool spoke his truth Friday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Comedian George Carlin, who once said his occupation should be described as "foole," drew tremendous laughter from the audience of 2,500 with his observations of the irrational in human behavior and the American language, like euphemisms used by airlines.

"Here's one they just made up: a near miss — where two airplanes almost collide," Carlin said. "Bullshit! That's not a near miss; that's a near hit. A near miss is a collision."

But like a ship in heavy seas, the audience's reaction dropped hard from wavetops of laughter into troughs of silence as Carlin criticized the hypocrisy of Americans during the age of Reagan and Bush.

"The only thing we want are military bases, even military bases packed with nuclear weapons, especially a good Army base. Why? Jobs," Carlin said. "(Continuing in an imitation of a worker) Sure, I'm willing to risk a little radiation."

"The working people in this country have been fucked over for so long, those are the kinds of decisions they face."

Carlin, who is famous for using obscenities in his monologues, began his show with scatological observations about right-wing politicians from President Bush to pro-life advocates.

"Don't you think it's a little bit weird that Ronald Reagan had an

Timbuk 3 star Barbara McDonald, balances her career with motherhood

Like most working mothers, Barbara McDonald is faced with a multitude of challenges arising from the delicate balance she must strike between her career and her family.

Unlike most working mothers, Barbara McDonald must balance parenting with being a rock star.

McDonald, half of the brother/sister duo that makes up the band Timbuk 3, doesn't have an ordinary 9-to-5 job. On any given day, she's warming up audiences for Sting, touring the country's arenas as a headliner, performing and recording music or involved in social activism — all while trying to raise her 8-year-old son.

An otherwise gregarious sort, she grows solemn when discussing her predicament.

"The thing that's probably the hardest is leaving my son behind," McDonald says earnestly. "He can't travel with us because he's got schoolwork and science projects."

While McDonald may leave her son behind when the band is on the road, no one can accuse her of neglect. "We talk every day on the phone," she says softly. Her ordinarily whimsical banter is tempered by seriousness. "(The band doesn't) try to go out for too long without seeing him. Otherwise, we get him on the road."

Though she regrets leaving her son behind, McDonald said she would never consider giving up her career like some people.

Fraternity to perform step show

Chapter plans to use fundraiser for service projects

Students will get a preview of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc.'s step show at noon, Nov. 5, in the Union Plaza. The real show will be Dec. 5 at Brandeberry Indoor Sports Complex. "We are having the step show to help raise funds to aid in the continuum of already established community-service projects," said Jerald Payne, senior in political science and Alpha Phi Alpha undergraduate chapter president.

He said a step show features sorority and fraternity members performing a series of rhythmic movements based on their African heritage.

"Everyone is welcome," Payne said. "We would like for the predominately white greek fraternities and sororities to be more in touch with the African-American greeks here at K-State."

The Alphas try to take part in community services at least every other month. Community projects include involvement with Big Brothers and Big Sisters, Project Alpha and the Clothes, Food and Toy Drive at Christmas.

"I think it is important that we do community service. I think a lot of people get the wrong impression when they think of fraternities," said Jayson Strickland, junior in elementary education and Alpha Phi Alpha member.

Payne said K-State's African-American greeks would like to incorporate the white greeks into more activities they do, like community service projects.

"It is important, just for the reason to help them be more familiar with us. We would like to broaden their knowledge of the black greeks," he said.

The black fraternities at K-State include Alpha Phi Alpha, Kappa Alpha Psi, Omega Psi Phi and Phi Beta Sigma.

Black sororities are Alpha Kappa Alpha, Delta Sigma Theta, Sigma Gamma Rho and Zeta Phi Beta.

SCOTT PASKE

Mitch deserves better

Why? Why? Why? Why? Why? Why? Don Nelson, you used to be cool. You spoke of Mitch Richmond like the sun rose and set in his jump shot. You turned him loose with Chris Mullin and Tim Hardaway, somebody called it Run TMC, and man, that was fun to watch.

You taught everybody in Manhattan the difference between Golden State and Golden Richards by making him a first-round NBA draft pick.

You called him a friend. Then, you traded him. To Sacramento. Good gravy, I wouldn't send my worst enemy to Sacramento.

That's like forcing Bing Crosby to sing with the Village People. Like ketchup on a peanut butter and jelly sandwich. Like plaid and pinstripes. It's gross.

Talk about a black hole. Sacramento is it. Will we ever hear from Mitch Richmond again?

A few years ago, K-State basketball fans were happy campers (back when camping was permitted) when Richmond's name was called by Golden State. We didn't know where it was. But we knew we could come to love it.

After all, we all knew that Rick Barry was the Warriors' superstar. Oops, sorry. Wrong era.

Anyway, it was great. We ran to Ballard's, bought our Mitch Richmond posters, Mitch Richmond T-shirts and a pair of Adidas basketball shoes.

Then we sprinted over to Kwik Shop and bought Big Red like it was going out of style.

Mitch chewed it. So could we.

Now, Don Nelson, you're making us stick that gum on the ends of our noses. You sent Mitch to Sacramento for the draft rights to Billy Owens. You tossed in center Les Jepsen and a 1995 second-round draft pick.

Come to think of it, maybe you're sticking that gum on Mitch's nose. What an insult. Send a former NBA Rookie of the Year to a horrible team, and show him what he's really worth by adding a no-name and a who-cares future draft pick.

Some friend you are. That 3-for-1 deal should be the other way around, shouldn't it? Sacramento should be the big giver instead of receiver.

Oh, it might not be so bad. Mitch will probably average 40 points per game, once he realizes that the Kings won't average 50 unless he scores that much.

This trade and Mitch Richmond are a few years too late. What if Richmond was sent to the Kings' former address — Kansas City?

Oh boy. Oh boy. Oh boy. Oh boy. Oh boy.

Those of us who remember when Mitch and his buddies would rock Ahearn Field House would probably make a few more eastbound trips down I-70 in the winter.

As you use the term of modern-day professional sports — "a business deal" — to defend your action, Don Nelson, let it be known that you've ignited the fuses of many of his fans (maybe he really hasn't, but get behind me on this. I'm on a roll).

We'll do something about this. Trust us. We'll, we'll ... burn down Calvin Hall.

Business deal, my eye. Judging from a few comments that have been tossed these parts since the trade was announced, it's obvious that Mitch Richmond left a big impression during his two years at K-State. The roar he created after that second-half dunk against Oklahoma at Ahearn in 1988 can still be heard for those who were there.

Mitch, your fans at Boyd Anderson High School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., Moberly (Mo.) Community College, K-State and Golden State equate your name with success. We hope it can continue.

Gaddis scores 3 touchdowns in 28-7 win

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

NORMAN, Okla. — Michael Smith took the pitch on a reverse and started to cut toward the line of scrimmage.

There they were. One, two, three — it seemed like a 100 — Oklahoma defenders staring the senior wide receiver in the face.

Negative yards again. And the Big Eight's giants remained safe from K-State for another year.

The Sooners continued their mastery over the Wildcats with a 28-7 win on a blustery Saturday at Owen Field.

"I think everybody saw the coldness when we woke up this morning and said, 'Oh, boy,'" center Quentin Neujahr said. "We've been practicing in it for three or four days, and I think everybody thought, 'Here we go again.'"

"I don't see much of this stuff where I'm from in Texas," Oklahoma line-backer Joe Bowden said. "Hey, it was cold. But K-State had to play in it, too."

No doubt, conditions were rough — 24 degrees with blowing snow in the second half — but it was the Sooners' defense that left the Cats frigid. Oklahoma built a 14-0 lead in the first quarter with 158 yards of total offense. K-State managed just three yards.

"It's difficult to create the intensity and emotion week in and week out," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "But it does surprise me that we were down 200 yards-to-nothing early in the game."

Shock value was minimal by halftime, as the Sooners led 21-0. The game's outcome was a done deal.

"I felt like we were in control of the game really from the opening drive," Oklahoma coach Gary Gibbs said.

Even though K-State's Jaime Mendez blocked a field goal to end OU's first march, it was difficult to disagree.

The Cats, who dropped to 4-4 overall, 1-3 in the Big Eight, started the second half with a 57-yard drive to Oklahoma's two-yard line. But on fourth-and-one, sophomore Kitt Rawlings was smothered for a 1-yard loss.

"They just stuffed the play," quarterback Paul Watson said. "It was a play that we should have scored on. It was partially my fault, partially the coaches' fault. I take the blame for that. I'm the one who makes the last call."

Whoever the culprit, the play ended the Cats' comeback hopes. Oklahoma erased seven minutes off the clock with its next drive, using the running of tailback Mike Gaddis, who finished the game with 35 carries for 191 yards and three touchdowns.

"The offensive line did a great job today, which made my job a lot easier," Gaddis said. "K-State tried a lot of stunting, but we really picked it up."

The same couldn't be said for the Cats' offense. Oklahoma recorded eight sacks and kept Watson on the run all day. One of his hurried passes was intercepted by Jason Belser at K-State's 29, setting up a 15-yard touchdown pass from Cale Gundy to Rickey Brady that gave the Sooners a 28-0 lead in the fourth quarter.

But that was all the Sooners could add to what was shaping up to be a rout. Snyder said there were no special changes or motivational speeches that inspired the improved second half.

"More than anything else, I think it was just a matter of them realizing that we hadn't played with the same intensity that we had in the last three weeks," he said. "If this was a K-State team that people were going to respect, they were going to have to pick it up in the second half."

Things did get better. K-State roared back after Oklahoma's final touchdown. Junior Gerald Benton returned a kickoff 34 yards. Five plays later, tight end Russ Campbell pulled down a Watson pass with one hand for 30 yards.

Oklahoma was called for roughing the passer, which moved the ball to the Oklahoma 2. On the next play, running back Eric Gallon slipped through the right side for K-State's only touchdown.

Yards were still hard to come by, however, as Watson was sacked three times after intermission.

"It gets you wondering what you can do just to get some yards," Watson said. "The biggest thing was we weren't establishing anything on first down."

Oklahoma defensive end Reggie Barnes, who recorded nine tackles and two sacks, said the Sooners' game plan had a lot to do with that.

"Our coaches had us prepared for all their schemes and everything that they did," he said. "Whenever we saw them line up in a different formation, we knew what to expect."

Offense looks for answers

Rugged stretch keeps Cats from moving ball

NORMAN, Okla. — Maybe now K-State's offense can return to normal. King Kong and Godzilla were a little rough on the Wildcats.

Not really, but back-to-back games against Colorado and Oklahoma have made for a horror-filled double feature. The Sooners were the latest to wreak havoc against the Cats, holding K-State to 248 yards of total offense on Saturday.

Most of K-State's troubles started early, as the offense ran just eight plays in the first quarter.

"We just didn't move the ball," quarterback Paul Watson said. "We didn't have the ball much and when we did get on the field, things weren't going very well."

"We're at a plateau right now, and it ain't very good."

K-State's woes were caused by a mix of stellar defense by Oklahoma and poor execution by the Cats. The Sooners sacked Watson eight times after Colorado posted nine last week. Oklahoma also turned K-State's first legitimate scoring threat away, tackling running back Kitt Rawlings for a loss on fourth-and-one from the OU 2.

"I don't know what's wrong with our offense," said tailback Eric Gallon, who was limited to 57 yards on 14 carries. "We sputter all the time and never get the job done when we need to."

Part of the reason on Saturday was self-destruction. In the first half, Watson fumbled a snap at K-State's 11 that set up the Sooners' second touchdown.

"It was more my fault than anybody else's," center Quentin Neujahr said. "It slipped in my hand when I went to snap it and I tried to force it up there."

Golfers begin play in Texas tourney

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

Golf coach Mark Elliott is shaking up his men's lineup again. It has become common this season as his men's and women's teams must qualify for each meet.

So the men will enter their sixth different roster in six meets as they travel to Fort Worth, Texas, for the Texas International Golf Championship. First-round action begins today. This time, senior Bill Graham, juniors Richard Laing and Brett Vuillemin, sophomore Will Siebert and freshman Brett Waldman will compete for the Wildcats.

"The qualifying tournaments have helped us get more out of practice rounds than before," Elliott said. "However, we're just not reacting well during them."

"With the qualifying, it's just a matter of who's playing the best at the time heading up to a meet. It's not going to bother me who those people are because I'm confident in them all."

Maybe not, but Elliott must be disturbed with leaving his No. 2 player, Jim Brenneman, at home.

Brenneman, a junior, has been a regular at tournaments during the past two seasons.

"Brenneman is definitely someone we need to have playing for us," Elliott said. "He's one of our most consistent players, but at this point, he didn't play well enough and I'm comfortable sending the five we are taking. But Brenneman is someone we were counting on for solid performance this spring."

Brenneman isn't the only key player that the Cats have missed in early-season competition. Graham and Vuillemin have both stayed at home from previous meets. Vuillemin's tournament scores rank as the second LAWRENCE — On a day better suited for the running of the Iditarod, K-State's cross country squads both posted disappointing team finishes at the Big Eight Championships Saturday at Rim Rock Farm.

Coach John Capriotti's men and women probably completed their day wishing they had been on board a sled with a canine companion leading the way.

But they weren't, and the treks across the snow-covered tundra in sub-freezing weather were made even tougher by the final results both teams faced.

The K-State women entered the competition minus top runner Janet Haskin but with great expectations of challenging for the team title. The Wildcats finished a distant second to Nebraska, trailing the Huskers by 28 points.

And the men were expected to finish a comfortable second, possibly even challenging perennial power Iowa State. They did neither, finishing in a tie for third with Kansas, a full 72 points off the pace set by Iowa State.

"I was disappointed, but only because of the high expectations we have now," Capriotti said. "We've come so far in cross country at K-State that finishing second and third is a disappointment now."

"In a lot of other programs, finishing second would be considered a big deal. For us, it isn't something we're real proud of."

In the women's race, K-State may have been doomed from the start. Seconds after the race had begun, a worried Capriotti noted that Nebraska had started strongly and that his team would be hard-pressed to catch the Huskers.

He was right. Before the first Wildcat had crossed the finish line, two Nebraska women were beginning the gradual process of thawing out after the 3.1-mile event. Fran ten Bessel won the individual title in a time of 17 minutes, 51 seconds to lead the Cornhuskers. Teammate Lisa Graham crossed the finish line sixth in a time of 18:27.

"I talked to Janet, Paulette and Martha Pinto after the race," Capriotti said of the top three K-State runners, "and they all talked about how they went out knowing what we wanted to do as a team, and held back as a result, hoping the other girls would catch them."

"By holding back, they probably kept themselves from having the kind of races they could have had. And we felt like Nebraska was better up front than we were."

Iowa State was definitely better up front than any other team in the men's competition, though K-State's Todd

Spikers eliminated from tourney berth after loss to Cyclones

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

The dream of playing at the Big Eight Tournament at Omaha, Neb., is over for the K-State volleyball team.

After losing on the road to Iowa State Saturday, the Wildcats fell to 1-8 in Big Eight play and were mathematically eliminated from the postseason event for the fourth consecutive year.

The Cyclones, coming off a tough win in five games on Friday, swept the Cats 15-7, 15-5, 15-8.

Iowa State dominated the match from start to finish and quickly foiled the spikers' effort to tie the season series.

"Iowa State played really well," K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "They played just as hard as they needed to win. We couldn't get on track at all."

K-State, which had more kills and digs than the Cyclones in the teams' first meeting, was dominated statistically by Iowa State on Saturday. The Cats' attack percentage was a dismal .093, as they managed just 23 kills. The Cyclones hit .345 with 43 kills.

Iowa State's dominance in the offensive line resulted from its effectiveness in blocking. The Cyclones had five solo blocks and 14 block assists in the match. K-State managed only four solo blocks.

The Cats, which fell to 10-16 overall, had poor defensive numbers, as well. Iowa State recorded 44 digs, while K-State had 28.

Hagemeyer said the Cats had a few bright moments, but were unable to stage a rally at any time during the match.

Iowa State, which improved to 5-4 in conference play and 13-9 overall, was led by Kari Mitchell. Mitchell had 10 kills in 13 attempts for a hitting percentage of .692.

Senior Rhonda Hughes turned in the best individual performance for K-State. Hughes recorded nine kills and a hitting percentage of .318. She was also the top defensive player, tying Stephanie Liester with seven digs.

The Cats return home Wednesday for a rematch with KU.

PRINCIPLES OF SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

BEFORE TRUSTING YOUR FUTURE TO ANY COMPANY, ASK FOR SOME LETTERS OF REFERENCE.

You put more than just your savings into a retirement company. You put in your trust and hopes for the future, too. So before you choose one, ask some questions. How stable is the company? How solid are its investments? How sound is its overall financial health?

A good place to start looking for answers is in the ratings of independent analysts. Three companies, all widely recognized resources for finding out how strong a financial services company really is, gave TIAA their top grade.

IN THE FINAL ANALYSIS, TIAA IS LETTER-PERFECT.

TIAA received A+ from A.M. Best Co., AAA from Standard & Poor's and Aaa from Moody's Investors Service. These ratings reflect TIAA's reliable claims-paying ability, exceptional financial strength, superior investment performance, and low expenses. With its guaranteed rate of return and opportunity for dividends, TIAA is one of less than ten companies, out of 2,200 nationwide, that received these highest marks.

CREF. FOUR MORE LETTERS EVERYONE SHOULD KNOW.

For further growth potential and diversification, there's the CREF variable annuity with four different investment accounts to give you the flexibility you want as you save for the future.

Together, TIAA and CREF form the nation's largest private retirement system, with over $95 billion in assets and more than 70 years of experience serving the education community. For over one million people nationwide, the only letters to remember are TIAA-CREF.

Timbuk 3's latest album, "Big Shot in the Dark," takes its name from a song the band wrote about this very dilemma.

"It's about people who start out with these ideals and goals and dreams, and they get sidetracked by whatever — whether it's by having children or having a nice house and nice cars," McDonald says. "All of a sudden they've got things, and their ideals or whatever it was that they used to wear on their sleeve are stuck in the back of the closet."

McDonald hasn't abandoned her ideals. Her band's staunch anti-materialism stance is reflected in both its lyrics and its attitude toward endorsements.

"The advertising industry has a way of making people want to live beyond their means and wanting to consume," she asserts. "Even though that's what our whole economy is based on, I don't think it's healthy for us or for our environment."

Timbuk 3 steadfastly refuses to allow its music to appear in advertisements that might fuel mindless consumerism, despite several lucrative offers.

"Everything from Sony to IBM to Disneyland," she says, sighing. "Our publisher knows we don't do commercials, but he's got the freedom to put it into movies. And sometimes it gets into some pretty bad movies."

Anti-consumerism isn't the only cause with which McDonald and her band are involved. Later this year, Timbuk 3 will play a benefit concert with Jackson Browne for an alternative high school in northern Arizona.

"It integrates things like ethnic equality and environmentalism with reading, writing and arithmetic," she says in her peculiar Canadian accent. "They sponsor kids from broken homes, but a lot of other people send their kids there, too."

The sadness in McDonald's voice has disappeared, replaced by a quiet energy as she discusses the balance she has struck between raising her son and helping build a better world for him.

"I do everything I can to make his life as fulfilling as possible, spiritually and mentally," she says firmly. "I try to be the best parent I can, but also you've got to realize that if there's some driving force within you that's pushing for some change — whether it's social or political or environmental — you've got to use your strengths and intuition and make that happen and not just say, 'Hopefully my son or daughter will carry on my work.'"

She speaks with a gentle authority now. Certainly there are unique challenges she must face. But McDonald seems to have a handle on what it takes to strike the balance between rock star and mother.

Harrass

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 harassed chose not to report it because they worked in lower-position jobs or they did not know what happened qualified as harassment.

"Too many people reportedly considered sexual harassment in the workplace to be a joke and dismiss the problem as normal sexual attraction between men and women," White said. Recurring incidents of sexual harassment in the workplace have an effect on women, she said.

About one-third of the women surveyed said their emotional and physical condition worsened and they missed more work after the harassment.

"One-third said their feelings about work became worse," Bergen said. "They didn't want to go to work. It was difficult to go, but they had to have the money, so they went."

The Cyclones had the top four men's finishers and the sixth place runner, with only Trask breaking the ISU onslaught.

Jonah Koech won the five-mile race in a time of 24:19. Trask's fifth-place time was 24:38.

"I think Todd did a great job," Capriotti said. "You've got to give the guy some credit. He came to me after the race and said he cramped up about half way through. What he did showed a lot of guts, and losing to Koech and Jonathon Brown (who finished first and fourth at last year's NCAA meet, respectively) is nothing to be ashamed of."

Golf

"They've both missed meets and as returning varsity players, we definitely need them at all of our meets," Elliott said.

They seem to have broken out of their slumps. Graham placed third at the last meet, the Cyclone Fall Classic, and Vuillemin added a 10th place finish.

Well rounded was the theme of the meet two weeks ago, as the entire team was among the top 12 finishers. Laing finished fifth and Brenneman tied with teammate David Sedlock for 11th.

operation on his asshole and George Bush had an operation on his middle finger," Carlin said.

"Isn't it a little bit weird that the people who are against abortion are people you wouldn't want to fuck in the first place?" he said.

It wasn't Carlin's language that silenced the audience but the subjects he described with it, like his description of the U.S. class system.

"The rich get all the money and don't pay any of the taxes," Carlin said. "The middle class do all the work and pay all the taxes. The poor are just to scare the shit out of the middle class."

Carlin also had scathing criticism for the Persian Gulf War.

"If you want to know what happened in the Persian Gulf, just look at the names of the two people who were running that war," he said. "Dick Cheney and Colin Powell. Somebody got fucked in the ass—that's what happened in this war."

Describing Americans as warlike people because of their declarations of wars on drugs, crime, cancer and a host of other ills, he pointed out there is no war on homelessness. To end the plight of the homeless, or "houseless" as Carlin said they should be called, the comedian suggested placing low-cost housing on land taken up by golf courses and cemeteries.

"What kind of medieval, religious, superstitious idea is this?" Carlin said. "Keep the dead people around in one part of town. Fuck. Let's dig 'em up and put them into the fields and streams of America. We need the phosphate. If we're going to do this recycling thing, let's go all the way."

Americans are most willing to wage war on people of color, he said.

many employees had to put in additional hours.

"The crews worked overtime quite a bit. We started at 3 a.m., early Thursday morning, working around the clock. We came on fairly quick doing everything. Now everything is in pretty good shape," he said.

Pearson said some areas posed more problems than others. Primarily in Aggieville, where parked cars hindered the crews wanting to come through with the cleaning machinery. Despite the extreme conditions, no more homeless people sought protection from the cold than usual.

"There was no increased demand for shelter during the weekend," said Lanette Thirkell, night-staff employee at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter. Apparently, the cold weather did not affect cable TV transmission.

"We didn't have any more emergency calls from people over the weekend than usual," said Diane Byers, an answering service staffer with Manhattan Cable TV Services.

On campus, the main walkways were accessible, but low temperatures produced a thick layer of ice by Friday that did not melt over the weekend. This caused some of the buildings to be barely accessible.

"Saturday night I had ushers escort our patrons from Fairchild to McCain because of the slick sidewalk they failed to clean up," said Sharon Wright. She said this year's facilities maintenance did not clean up the icy situation very well.

"Last year they did an excellent job. This year they haven't. We called services about the icy sidewalks. They should have been out Thursday already," she said.

McCain

Andreas Bach, pianist Sunday, November 10, 3 p.m.

This brilliant young pianist has followed early recognition in Europe with a string of inspiring concerts across the United States. His performances combine a powerful technique, exceptional conviction, and sensitivity. Of a recital at the Eastman School of Music, the Rochester Times-Union said, "The worst of his playing was merely superb; the best--and there was plenty of it--was breathtaking."

Once you've heard Andreas Bach, you'll wish you'd continued those piano lessons.

Day hectic for candidates

Despite small audiences, candidates appear at debates

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Many student body president candidates hit the campaign trail harder than usual Monday night. It was the last night before the commencement of student government elections.

Candidates spoke and answered questions at numerous locations ranging from the College Republicans' meeting at the K-State Union to residence hall floors to garner support for their individual campaigns.

Students may vote today and Wednesday in the K-State Union for student body president, senator and Board of Student Publications candidates.

West Hall's first-floor lobby served as one of the candidates' forums from the 8 to 9 p.m. time slot. About 20 people showed up there to hear what the candidates had to say, including Dawn McCarthy, sophomore in marketing.

"If I don't listen to the candidates and know their opinions, I couldn't make an informed vote," she said. "I'm not going to vote on just which sign I liked best on some tree."

McCarthy said it is important for students to get to know the candidates.

"It's important to be here so I know what they plan to do when they get in office," she said.

Steffany Klaus, senior in family life and community service, said she attended the West Hall candidate forum because of circumstances surrounding last year's election.

"Last year there were no good candidates," she said. "I was interested in coming down to see if we had anyone decent running this year."

Klaus said that not many people show up at the candidate debates.

"Even though only a few people show up at these, word spreads fast," she said. "We'll form our opinions, and others will pick up on that."

Craig Uhrich, senior in nuclear engineering and presidential candidate, spoke at several places and focused his attention on ethics, difficulties with the K-State financial aid system and implementation of a summer Senate.

"My main issues are putting ethics back into student government and making sure student government represents the interests of students in the student body, not the administration or people in Senate," he said.

Uhrich said he realizes there is a problem with the financial aid process at K-State and he is willing to try to make it easier for students.

More buried insecticide barrels found

Contamination in soil samples prompts search

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

Eight to 10 more barrels of the insecticide DDT have been uncovered in a section of land west of Manhattan where two barrels of it were removed in early October.

The barrels were detected when soil samples removed from the site tested positive for DDT contamination.

"We're not sure what the barrels had or have in them," said John Lambert, director of public safety.

The area of land being dug through contains other things like tree limbs and car parts, which were also disposed of by burial at about the same time. Farm dumps of this type were not uncommon 25 years ago, Lambert said.

The barrels just found are a different color than the other barrels removed.

"This color difference may mean that something other than DDT was or is in the barrels," said Dennis Matteson, extension specialist.

Matteson first brought the buried chemicals to the University's attention in October 1990. His home is located one-half mile from where the DDT and new barrels are located.

Because the barrels were buried between 1965 and 1968, in accordance with existing government regulations regarding the disposal of hazardous waste, there are no records of the number or the location of the barrels.

No one is sure how many barrels were buried. Estimates range from two to 15, Matteson said.

Earl Slagle, an employee of the Department of Forestry at the time the barrels were buried, said, "I only remember four or five barrels being buried there. I saw them loaded onto the back of a truck, but there was only four or five barrels. I don't know when or who put these other barrels there."

After the buried chemicals were brought to the attention of the University, two problems had to be dealt with before they could be removed — the location and number of barrels.

Ken Neuhauser, geology professor at Fort Hays State University, was engaged by the University to locate the barrels. Neuhauser used the equivalent of a high-powered metal detector to collect magnetic signals and map the results.

Cookbooks have more than recipes

Most of collection donated; some printed in 1800s

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

A pig's head should be baked for an hour and a half before it's ready to serve. At least that's what "The American Home Cook Book" says. Unique recipes like this can be found in the rare cookbook collection in Farrell Library's special collections department.

One of the best cookery collections in the nation, it contains about 4,000 volumes, making it the largest group of books in special collections. Several books in the collection are considered rare, including some that are not in the Library of Congress or the British Library.

A Latin cookbook printed in 1541 is the oldest in the collection, while many of the other books date back to the 1800s. Besides Latin and English, some of the books are also printed in French, Italian, German or Russian.

"Manuscript Cookery Receipts" contain recipes that are actually handwritten by the authors in beautiful script writing.

But several of the books contain more than just recipes for what our ancestors ate for dinner.

John Vander Velde, special collections librarian, said some of the books have etiquette tips and folk remedies.

The "Ladies Receipt Book" gives tips on how to make a candlestick, how to prepare the soles of shoes to resist water and it gives a simple substitute for a shower — sit on a stool while someone pours water from a pot over your body.

The collection was started in 1943 when Abby Marlatt left her valuable 600-volume cookbook collection to the University.

The collection included 116 books that were printed in the 1800s and several that were co-authored by Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of

Wheat prices rise 34 percent

1991 better year for farmers, overall prices increasing

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — The price Kansas farmers received for their wheat jumped about 9 percent during the first half of October, and farm prices increased generally, the state's crop monitoring agency reported Monday.

Kansas Agricultural Statistics said the price of wheat Oct. 15 was $3.14 per bushel, or 27 cents higher than the figure for September. The price also is about 34 percent higher than it was a year ago.

Prices for all farm products increased about 5 percent, KAS reported. Generally, crop prices were significantly higher than they were in October 1990, but livestock prices were lower. KAS measures agricultural prices in comparison to what farmers were paid in 1977. In its latest monthly report, it said the all-products index Oct. 15 was 171 percent of the base figure, compared to 163 percent for September.

The figure was 170 percent for October 1990, meaning that overall, farm prices have increased only slightly from a year ago.

In 1990, Kansas farmers harvested a record wheat crop of 472 million bushels. The harvest this year was 363 million bushels, or 23 percent smaller.

KAS said the September price for wheat was $2.87 per bushel. The October 1990 price was $2.35 per bushel, or 79 cents lower than the price on Oct. 15.

The price for wheat was highest in northeast Kansas, at $3.28 per bushel. It was lowest in southwest Kansas, where farmers were paid $3.04 per bushel.

Mideast talks end with frustration

Next round of negotiations this month if U.S. can find 'acceptable' location

By the Associated Press

MADRID — Arabs and Israelis went home Monday with mixed feelings of frustration and anticipation after an intense foray into the realm of peace. Israel and Syria were mired in recriminations, but promised to meet again.

MIDDLE EAST

The talks smashed a 43-year taboo on direct Israel-Arab talks, setting in motion a process of face-to-face negotiations to resolve one of the most intractable regional conflicts in the world.

The United States and the Soviet Union sponsored the talks, and President Bush's assessment was: "We have a long way to go and interruptions will probably occur, but hopes are bright."

The brightest are for negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians living under its military rule in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The dimmest are for a thaw between Israel and Syria, the regions most bitter foes.

"I would like to express our regret for leaving this city without having tangible results," said Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa.

Hard-line Israelis inaugurated a new Jewish settlement in the Golan Heights just hours after the talks ended. Syria's main demand is for the return of the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast war.

There were also reports that Israel troops shelled the position of radical Muslim guerrillas in Lebanon.

In the Iranian capital of Tehran, Shiite Muslim demonstrators burned American and Israeli flags and an effigy of Uncle Sam outside the former U.S. Embassy compound to mark its takeover 13 years ago by Iranian radicals.

The late-night talks in Madrid were the first-ever direct discussion between Israel and Syria, and they lasted five hours into the early hours of Monday. The enemies failed to move even an inch from their position.

Syria refused an Israeli request to establish direct contacts to arrange the site for the next round of talks scheduled later this month.

Both agreed to meet again — if the United States comes up with an acceptable location. Officials on both sides said Washington, D.C., or other sites in North America were possible.

An Israeli spokesman said Monday that Israel would still prefer the talks be held alternately in Israel and Syria, or along their border. Syria remained just as adamantly in favor of a neutral site and accused Israel of being intransigent.

Israel's delegates "talked about everything except the land that the Israelis occupied and have been oc-cupping for the last 24 years. That is the Golan Heights," al-Sharaa said.

The Israelis countered that Syria's demand for Israeli concessions dominated the meeting. "If they keep up their ... demands, there will not be any progress," said Israeli spokesman Yossi Olmert.

Interest rates expected to drop again

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Reserve will decide today to lower interest rates once again, many private economists predicted.

Some analysts said Monday they believed Washington policymakers will be forced to take more dramatic steps in a bid to dissipate widespread gloom about the economy.

These economists saw the chance for a triple-play package of further federal-rate cuts coupled with a tax-cut package from Congress to put money in consumers' pockets and an easing of bank regulations aimed at alleviating the credit crunch.

While ruling out a tax cut this year in the interview in the Wall Street Journal, White House budget director Richard Darman said, "If the economy is still sputtering, then it is conceivable to me that there would be the right political context in which to enact a responsible tax cut (next year)."

While economists were split on the chances of a tax cut in 1992, they were in general agreement that at least one more round of federal-rate cuts was in the offing given the dismal economic reports of recent weeks.

The government reported last week that the unemployment rate climbed to 6.8 percent in October, while home sales took their biggest nosedive in 20 years and consumer confidence plunged. After the unemployment report Friday, President Bush renewed his call for the central bank to lower interest rates.

The Fed's top policymaking committee, the Federal Open Market Committee, will meet behind closed doors today to consider what to do next.

Accounting system will help shelter

Many Manhattan organizations are updating their services to keep up with today's new technologies, and Beta Alpha Psi, a K-State accounting honorary, is helping the Manhattan Emergency Shelter do the same.

Beta Alpha Psi formed a seven-person committee in September with three goals in mind: to establish an accounting system for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, to train its own bookkeeper to maintain a current accounting system and to computerize the program.

The shelter's bookkeeper, who is a senior citizen working on the project through Green Thumb, is learning how the accounting field has changed since she last took an accounting class years ago. Green Thumb is a project that finds employment for senior citizens and pays for their training.

The Emergency Shelter's old accounting system contained a chart that was difficult to maintain.

Terry Carlgen, senior in accounting and co-chairman of the committee, said the new system is a double-entry accounting system using generally accepted accounting principles. It is more efficient and makes mistakes easier to check.

The committee will work next semester on computerizing the system for the shelter. Carlgen said it is a long process, but it will be completed by March.

Lab tries to grow parasite, find way to destroy it

Organism causes flu symptoms, leads to death in AIDS patients

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

Parasites thriving in any human body are dangerous, but for AIDS patients they are a more serious problem.

Steve Upton, assistant professor of biology, is currently working on a project that could potentially lead to an experimental system to test pharmaceuticals against the parasite Cryptosporidium parvum.

Upton's lab received a three-year, $318,838 National Institute of Health grant. The funding came from the AIDS and Related Diseases study section of NIH.

C. parvum is a common parasite that lives in the small intestine. Upton said if tested, one-third of Americans would test positive for the parasite, which causes flu-like symptoms. And, because there is no drug that can cure the problem, victims have to suffer through the infection for about a week.

The real problem occurs when AIDS patients are infected with the parasite.

"In relatively healthy individuals, the parasite infects the human body and then goes away," Upton said. "But in AIDS patients, it causes persistent infections and leads to a chronic dehydration which can result in death."

According to a press release, C. parvum is the third most common cause of death from parasite infections in AIDS patients, after Pneumocystis pneumonia and toxoplasmosis.

Upton said he and the three graduate students working on the project have three main objectives to reach.

"The grant we received is going to idly."

The students working with Upton are Michael Tilley, graduate student in microbiology, and Mark Eggleston and Ralene Mitschler, graduate students in biology.

Tilley has been working on the parasite for about five years for his dissertation.

Eggleston, who joined the team about a year ago, said his work involves trying to figure out the precise concentrations of parasites to use in cell cultures. He said he is also working with the different nutritional additives.

Upton said Mitschler has been analyzing lipids of parasites because there is evidence of unusual lipids.

Upton said the main problem with research on AIDS and related diseases is the high risk of failure because of the limited background knowledge. allow us to test a lot of our theories that we have about requirements needed to grow the parasite," Upton said. "We are going to look at the atmosphere, the nutritional additives and the host-cell type."

The challenge, he said, is finding a good cell culture system in which the parasite will grow.

"If we can get a system where we can grow it (the parasite) in the laboratory, then it will make studying it and testing pharmaceuticals much easier," Upton said. "If hundreds of pharmaceuticals can be screened each week, then I think we can find something to stop the parasite pretty rapidly."

Quartet jazzes with strings

'Hip, young' musical group to perform at McCain tonight, director says

MISSY GUSTIN
Collegian Reporter

The Uptown String Quartet will perform at 8 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said this quartet is different than most because it plays jazz with strings.

"We don't ordinarily think of string quartets as playing jazz," Martin said.

The Uptown String Quartet originated from the famous Max Roach Double Quartet. Roach, a legendary composer and percussionist, brought the quartet together about 10 years ago when he wanted a female string quartet to play alongside his regular quartet. His daughter, Maxine Roach, plays the viola and is a composer in the quartet.

"I feel that Max Roach is the guiding light behind the ensemble," Martin said.

The quartet has appeared on the TV programs "CBS Nightwatch," "The Today Show" and "The Eleventh Hour," and the WGBH program "Say, Brother."

Tonight's numbers will include

JAZZ PERFORMANCE

WHO: The Uptown String Quartet
WHAT: Modern and traditional jazz
WHEN: 8 p.m., tonight
WHERE: McCain Auditorium
HOW MUCH: $12 for public, $6 for students and senior citizens

"Amazing Grace," "Extensions," "I Feel Good," "Easy Winners" and

"Jelly Roll Rag."

"The quartet is a group of younger musicians. They are a swinging, kind of hip group of people," Martin said.

Eileen Folsom, who had been scheduled to perform as cellist with the group, recently went on maternity leave. The cellist replacing her will be James Cooper III.

The performance is a Mid-America Arts Alliance (a non-profit regional arts organization) program. Additional support has been provided by the K-State fine arts fee.

Tickets are $12 for the public and K-State faculty and $6 for senior citizens and students.

Tune-ups can help beat cold weather

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Old Man Winter can wreak havoc on unsuspecting car owners, and Manhattan auto mechanics have been busy since the recent storm helping vehicle owners prepare for winter.

"This storm caught a lot of people off guard," said Gregg Frakes, owner of Precision Automotive Inc.

Frakes said a good tune-up in the fall could prevent car problems during the winter.

The most important thing to check is the antifreeze.

"It only takes about two minutes to check it," Frakes said.

Frakes said the antifreeze should be good to at least 40 degrees below zero.

Disposing of the old antifreeze should be done carefully, he said.

"The Environmental Protection Agency has not declared antifreeze a hazardous waste. What makes it hazardous is when it picks up toxins in the car while it is being used," Frakes said.

Antifreeze should be disposed of by recycling or by placing it in a sealed container.

Frakes said the majority of people will winterize their cars in the next two weeks.

Mike Konkright, manager of Bud's Auto Service said motorists should check belts, hoses, tires, brakes, shocks and antifreeze.

"You never know about this Kansas weather," Konkright said. "Car owners should change the oil every 3,000 miles and make sure they have good all-season tires."

Terry Wark, manager of Wildcat Amoco, said it is important to keep the gas tank full to prevent condensation in the tank.

"Don't buy cheap gas during the winter," Wark said.

Wark said using high quality gasoline will prevent the need for fuel additives during winter.

Local mechanics agreed that preventive maintenance can keep vehicles running during the cold winter months and prevent Old Man Winter from causing expensive repair bills.

WHY VOTE FOR THE LIBRARY REFERENDUM?

- More Student Services -guarantees a library student lounge with vending services, facilities for extended hours with security.
- Now or Never -if the referendum fails to pass, $5 million in alumni donations may be lost and matching State funding in this decade will be unlikely.
- No Student Fee Increase -existing student fees are not increased. Current fees are continued to support the purchase of $5 million in bonds in 1996 if student funds are matched by alumni and State funds.
- Better Environment -provides central air conditioning, sofa style seating, quiet study space, and 1,150 additional first-quality study spaces.
- More Space -adds 122,250 square feet to Farrell's existing 148,000 square feet. Provides shelf space for 900,000 new volumes. Nearly doubles current size of Farrell.
- A Science Library -establishes a central sciences/technology library.

REFERENDUM

QUESTION & ANSWERS

Question: Why are both the Library and the Rec Complex on the same ballot?

Answer: Both are in need of expansion and renovation. Since both can be funded with NO INCREASE in costs to students, now is the time to vote to re-direct current bond monies to these projects. Both projects must be supported by the students as these are becoming a "now or never" situation.

Question: Will this cost the student more?

Answer: NO! These projects only re-direct current monies being collected and do not increase any fees. This is a very important point to understand--There will be NO INCREASE IN FEES TO DO THESE PROJECTS.

Question: When will these projects start?

Answer: The Rec Complex will start in the Fall of 1992 with completion expected late 1993 or early 1994. The Library fee accumulation begins in the Spring of 1994. Foundation and State contributions must be finalized by 1996 or the student commitment will end.

Question: Should either the Library or the Rec Complex fail, will the money go to the other's project?

Answer: No, not without an entire new referendum being established by Student Senate, with considerable time delays. The "best of both worlds" is now and students must vote yes for both to take advantage of all possibilities.

Question: Why should students pay part of the cost of the library expansion?

Answer: Expansion is critically needed and can not wait for the State to provide full funding. Most new Regents' University structures built in this century will require student/private/federal contributions.

Question: Why is the Rec Complex getting more money for its project than the Library?

Answer: The Library will also receive Foundation and State support. The student contribution is to help show student commitment and to help bring this project to the forefront. The Rec Complex has always been and will continue to be supported by student fees only.

Question: What is needed to pass this referendum?

Answer: Of those students voting, 60% must vote in favor of the project to make it pass.

WHY VOTE FOR THE REC COMPLEX REFERENDUM?

REC COMPLEX

- A MUCH LARGER WEIGHT/FITNESS ROOM--Almost three times larger than current room with area for free weights, machines, a circuit area, and cardiovascular machines.
- AN AEROBIC/MULTI-ACTIVITY ROOM--About the size of two basketball courts for aerobic sessions. Special floor, improved sound system and acoustics.
- FOUR MORE BASKETBALL COURTS
- A LONGER ELEVATED TRACK
- CONVERT CURRENT WEIGHT ROOM TO A TABLE TENNIS ROOM
- AIR CONDITION ENTIRE BUILDING
- RENOVATE SOME AREAS includes re-surfacing gym and racquetball court floors

OUTDOORS

- RE-SURFACE TENNIS COURTS AND UPGRADE LIGHTS
- LIGHT PLAYFIELDS to include four softball fields for night play
- INSTALL UNDERGROUND IRRIGATION FOR PLAYFIELDS

WHERE DOES THE MONEY COME FROM?

This will be accomplished WITHOUT ANY INCREASE IN FEES TO THE STUDENTS. Current monies would be re-directed to this expansion.

TIME OF COMPLETION?

After a successful vote, the State would hire an architect with construction to begin in the fall of 1992. Completion of the additional facilities and opening would be late 1993 or early 1994.

Reorganization on-going process

One year ago, more than 2,000 people marched through K-State to protest reorganization. Today, they will march again.

The reunion march will begin at 11:30 a.m. today in front of Seaton Hall in the K-State Union Plaza.

For many, reorganization seems like a forgotten, cured illness the campus suffered. However, the malignancy still lingers.

The shrinking line schedule and the merging of departments confirm that reorganization still exists and is silently continuing.

Students, faculty and staff should show the University administration and the Kansas Board of Regents the concern about the future of K-State is still great.

Don't let President Jon Wefald forget about the frustration caused by overflowing or cut classes. Don't let Wefald forget about what happens when he makes a decision to close two of the most prestigious colleges at K-State. Don't let him forget about the day 2,000 people put the fear of God in him when they chased him home — one year ago today.

GO VOTE Elections offer students voice

Today and tomorrow students have the opportunity to voice their opinions about the future of K-State in the SGA general elections.

Although editorials urging you to vote in the elections and on the referendum have already been written this semester, we want to reiterate how powerful students really can be through the voting process.

Poor voter turnout tends to turn the elections into a popularity contest, and it swerves away from the real issues. Listen to what the candidates are saying and vote for the one you think best represents K-State's interests.

And something that definitely represents the University's best interest is the library and rec referendum, which is also on the ballot.

The polls will be open from 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. today and Wednesday on the first floor of the Union. The SGA office will also send a representative to the Veterinary Complex from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. both days.

So take this opportunity to voice your opinions and better K-State at the same time.

Protesters against reorganization surround President Jon Wefald last fall. Today marks the first anniversary of the protests against Wefald's proposed destruction of the colleges of Human Ecology and Architecture.

Still fighting reorganization

TIM CONNER GUEST

SCOTT HALEY GUEST

Tim Conner and Scott Haley are graduate students in regional and community planning.

Last year, the president of our university made a proposal to eliminate the colleges of Architecture and Design and Human Ecology, merge numerous departments and programs and cut faculty and graduate research and teaching assistantships in an effort to make K-State a "better" institution of higher education.

He called it reorganization. It came top down, without the participation of those most effected — the deans, department heads, faculty, staff and students. He eventually admitted it was poor planning and bad politics.

Although withdrawn due to intense protests, reorganization still looms overhead in the form of strategic planning and is again creeping closer to deciding the fate of our education.

Those same players are involved in the development of another "kinder, gentler" reorganization proposal.

As students trying to learn from history, let's take a step back and look at what is going on. There is a lack of money statewide. Need we say more?

Future fiscal cuts (including here at K-State) are unfortunate, but may be necessary. There are several ways this can be addressed.

One, eliminate university colleges and programs duplicated elsewhere in the regents system. The down side is that such elimination could destroy the synergy among associated programs.

A second approach would be to streamline academic and non-academic services within each Kansas university. The up side is that there is not much fat to cut and such cuts could lead to potentially weaker programs.

Now, if we are going to talk about these types of cuts we must understand what is important to preserve. According to its "land-grant mission" — teaching, research and public service

— K-State is "dedicated to higher education that can serve the present and future needs of Kansas, the United States and the world" and be "responsive to the needs of an ever-changing world."

Therefore, preserving community service, practical research and teaching must remain an essential focus.

Secondly, the comprehensive nature of the University can provide the synergy that arises from associated programs. As one example, landscape architecture, architecture, planning, geography, civil engineering, economics, sociology, public administration and human ecology all share common ties in the academic programs. The whole is greater than the sum of the parts.

In addition to this synergy and crucial on-campus interaction, many local, regional and state programs and projects are indirectly dependent or totally impacted by this synergy (e.g., Community Service Program, Strategic Planning Initiative, Operation Bootstrap and several other economic development related programs). The importance of economic development is continually stressed in K-State's land-grant mission. The quality of the education available at K-State cannot be measured on a ledger sheet. Statistics, such as the number of graduates, or credit-hour production, or FTEs are not necessarily measures of the true value of the many programs available on the K-State campus. A Holistic view of education and its process must be understood and available to all in the university setting.

If we want to preserve this synergy and stay true to the land-grant mission (of which the College of Architecture and Design and the College of Human Ecology are an integral part) we need to incorporate the participation of deans, department heads, faculty and students in the process. It is these people who are closest to the issues and have an acute awareness of the true value of the programs offered. Unfortunately, these same people may tend to be self-serving.

Therefore, we ask that the Kansas Board of Regents make a great effort to listen to the people most intimately involved and make decisions that will meet the broader educational needs of the state. Kansas is among a handful of states in which the regents have the ability to coordinate those resources in the most appropriate manner. Each effort must successfully create a conduit of information between the Board of Regents and the institutions and their students, to prevent either a top-down or self-serving (political) process.

Recognizing that cuts may represent one option in the process, it is certainly not the only option available in the system. It is therefore essential that we have a two-tiered approach, which includes the regents and each individual institution working together for the same common "good" of the educational system in Kansas. It is essential to review the dynamics of the state university system within a comprehensive statewide planning process. Anything less may condemn us to repeat the errors of the past.

Last year's "plan" represented the wrong approach. We need a better and more traditional process that will ensure a fair and equitable solution to the resource problems as they impact the quality of education available to Kansans and others who receive the education in the regents system.

We ask you to join the student bodies of the College of Architecture and Design and the College of Human Ecology on the steps of Seaton Hall at 11:25 today to learn more about Re-3 organization. Show support for the University that you have chosen.

Candidates for student body president rated on slime scale

The following column in no way represents the opinion of the Collegian Editorial Board or the Collegian staff members.

Suzie watched the student body presidential debates with me, and her reaction was a fit of uncontrollable laughter. Once she recovered however, she told me that I had better write a column about who not to vote for.

"Whichever of these schmucks gets elected will serve for three semesters, right?" she asked. I nodded, and she went on.

"Then you had better make sure you tell everyone not to vote for the slimy ones," she said.

I'm a bit more skeptical than Suzie about how many people will actually listen to what I tell them, and Suzie doesn't realize that slime has a way of oozing around pesky things like ethics and truth.

I should do my part, however, even if my part is plastering my own, biased opinions all over the Opinion Page. So, I've scribbled down my own blurbs on each of the candidates. Of course, these little comments are mine and mine alone. Student Publications Inc. and the Collegian Editorial Board have both opted not to endorse a particular candidate, so the sliminess rating I've given each individual doesn't reflect the opinion of anyone but myself — and maybe Suzie.

Roy Cessna: He seems like an okay sort of guy, but I really don't know. He didn't say anything of substance at the debate, but he seemed intelligent and mostly articulate. My only criticisms of him are that he didn't tell us much about his stance except that he wants things to run better, and that he seems sort of bland.

Bland is much better than slimy however. Cessna gets a sliminess rating of 4, just because he wants us to vote for him without knowing much about him.

Craig Uhrich: Running on an "ethics" platform, in Uhrich's case, is just good business. He seems to be hoping that student outrage over furniture masco will get him elected.

Assuming he's being honest about this ethics thing, and it's not just a campaign ploy (which is a big assumption in any politics), Uhrich is still part of a system that has repeatedly screwed students over. Perhaps it's unfair, but I hold it against him, and against the other student government politicians who are running. Based on little or no evidence, I give him a sliminess rating of 4.5.

Todd Giefer: Todd seems to be an obnoxious sort of guy. Obnoxious can be good, but not in Todd's case.

He's good at being full of righteous anger, but he's not so good at giving good reasons or ways to change. Few of his actual policies made sense, and the ones that did were very obviously wrong. Critical thinking doesn't seem to be Todd's high point.

to get elected rather than logic. He might be intelligent, but I couldn't tell, because he was mostly inarticulate. He was loudly inarticulate, too. He only gets a sliminess rating of 6, but I'm not going to vote for him.

Jackie McClaskey: Jackie thinks that K-State student government spends too much time looking at the big picture and not enough time taking care of little things. She says she will go to the students, rather than waiting for the students to come to her.

This isn't just a strikingly unoriginal and transparent campaign ploy, it's a dumb campaign ploy. She seems intelligent, articulate, and as slimy as last year's pudding. Sliminess rating of 8.

Fred Wingert: I'm not sure that I am a good enough writer to articulate how much I want Wingert not to win. Think of voting for Chuck Manson, Adolf Hitler, The Anti-Christ, etc. and you will begin to understand the scope of my feeling on this subject.

Candidates for this office are allowed to spend just as much money on their campaign as they did on their tuition.

Wingert, it seems, has spent every cent of that amount. The idea that he might be elected because he spent his parents' money and his friends' parents' money on bright red sweatshirts and flashy signs makes my skin crawl.

As a person, Wingert is probably a great guy. He seems to have a lot of friends. But as I watched the debate, I realized everything I despise and loath to the core of my being. Sliminess rating of 9. Enough said.

Shawn Bruce: Bruce is intelligent and articulate, in a big, goofy sort of way. He is the only candidate who I'm sure won't turn out to be a slime. He is also the only candidate so far who has told us what he is actually going to do as student president, rather than giving us vague sound-bytes about "taking care of little things" and "making the students first." He gets a sliminess rating of 3.

Besides, Bruce hasn't put up any posters at all. He hasn't wasted a whole lot of paper on trying to cram his name down our throats, like every other candidate. Think of him as the environmental president, saving paper.

Keep in mind that my rating system is logarithmic, sort of like the Richter Scale. So Wingert's sliminess rating of 9 means that Wingert is one million times as slimy as Bruce with his rating of 3.

Bruce has my vote, simply because I'm sure he isn't a slimeball. Suzie, if she actually gets around to voting, will probably write in Frank Zappa.

I hope that I'm right about these candidates, and that everyone else feels the same way as I do. But whatever you do, vote against slime. To me, slime is Wingert and McClaskey.

But one thing everyone should vote "yes" for is the Farrell expansion. Please vote "yes" on the Farrell referendum, just so after we all graduate, our degrees are more than worthless scraps of paper with bits of pretty writing on the front.

LEADERSHIP WEEK

Events planned to teach skills for future

BERNARD FRANKLIN GUEST

Bernard Franklin is assistant dean of student life and director of student leadership development programs.

This is K-State Leadership Week, thanks to the efforts of our distinguished Blue Key Senior Honorary. This week is intended to assist students in reaching the complex understanding of leadership for the 21st century.

A new era is rapidly approaching and may be upon us. Our world is presently going through a radical transformation, which is changing the basic structures upon which the present industrial era has been based.

We need leaders with a heart for building cross-cultural relationships, with a soul for applying the right principles to the process of leadership and leaders with the spirit to face change with the hope that things can always be better.

We must graduate engineers, architects, farmers, journalists, teachers, public administrators, accountants and restaurant managers with the intellectual capacity for developing and implementing leadership theory in the work place and in public service.

Leadership is being transformed from the industrial paradigm, and during this period leaders are needed in every barrio, ghetto, hamlet, village and rural community across this nation and around the world. Leadership may be the vital force to a peaceful and smooth global transition.

As we face a period of uncertainty in a state void of strong leadership, it is time for students to develop a plan for becoming leaders — especially since some of you may lead our state into the 21st century. We cannot continue to hold on to the claim that the mission of higher education is to educate the mind only and leadership is simply a bi-product.

Leadership Week provides you a special opportunity to gain some new perspectives about leadership for a changing world. You can hear leaders from our state discuss some of their day-to-day leadership challenges. You can also ask these leaders questions about future leadership and how one might prepare for future responsibilities.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, you will inherit a world desperately in need of fresh leadership approaches to extremely challenging issues. I hope you will take advantage of this unique opportunity to prepare yourself for the leadership roles you will encounter.

Gun control argument nonsense

Editor,

It appalls me to see nonsense sprayed throughout the media about how gun control will curb crime and make the United States a safer place to live, including an editorial in the Oct. 22 Collegian.

The following are some facts from the 1990 FBI Uniform Crime Report.

"In 1990, assault rifles were used in only 3.7 percent of all homicides, the lowest rate in 10 years. Even though the overall homicide rate increased from 1989 to 1990, the number of rifle-related homicides, 743, was the lowest of any year in the 1980s.

"California, which banned so-called assault rifles in 1989, has seen an 8.4-percent real increase (in addition to the national rate) in the number of homicides. In Washington, D.C., where handguns were banned in 1977, the homicide rate has increased 189 percent, setting a record for the highest homicide rate ever recorded for a large U.S. city. Since banning assault rifles in Boston in 1989, the homicide rate has risen 46 percent despite a drop of 7 percent between 1989-90 for the state of Massachusetts as a whole. Since becoming a federal felony to avoid tough gun laws by acquiring guns out of state, New York City has seen an increase in the homicide rate of 169 percent and a handgun-related increase in homicides of almost 340 percent.

"On the other hand, where Florida has made it easier to obtain handgun carrying permits for self-protection, the homicide rate has fallen 6 percent in the past three years despite a national increase in the homicide rate of 13 percent over the same time period."

The list continues, providing overwhelming evidence that progressive gun-control measures are a farce. Crime is the disease, not handguns, assault rifles or magazines and clips larger than seven rounds.

Operation Blue Jeans should help U.S.

Editor,

This is in response to the article in the Oct. 30 Collegian in which we are told that 1 million pairs of jeans are to be collected to send to the Soviet Union.

The comment, "the people (Russians) looked like Americans," should be remembered for its insight into our common specieshood. Likewise, the group sponsoring Operation Blue Jeans should be congratulated for wanting to enable communication between people.

However, their reasoning for doing this is as cracked as the Berlin Wall — that reason being to ultimately recruit them to the United States to learn the free market. The Russians are learning about the free market already, as are the East Germans and the Poles and the Salvadorans and the Guatemalans. They don't need our help; in fact, less of it might be a good thing.

Why not send a million jeans elsewhere, like the United States? With 25 percent of our children born into poverty, surely it would be no problem to find 1 million people in the United States who could use a pair of jeans.

The best part of the idea would come through education: The deserving recipients of the jeans could teach the business classes a thing or two about the free market. The students could learn from this group of poor how they are required by the free market to remain in poverty and perhaps unemployed. Without the competition between the poor and unemployed, the free market fails. There is a price for the free market — poverty, hunger and, for the unlucky ones, death.

Recycling worthwhile

Editor,

On behalf of students seeking to better our environment, I would like to address the issue of recycling on our campus. Although diligent efforts have been made by organizations such as SAVE to encourage students to recycle, not enough publicity has been given to this purpose.

I realize budget cuts do not help the problem, but in a lot of ways, they should not hinder our efforts. In fact, we as students should be even more motivated to promote recycling campuswide. A program of this nature does not produce an amazing profit overnight but, instead, must endure long term to see the benefits.

Our environment is slowly giving into the harsh treatment of society. We must stop the deterioration before it is too late. Each student at K-State produces approximately four pounds of garbage a day. And of this amount, two pounds can be recycled. We took the time and effort to produce the trash, why not take the time to dispose of it safely?

Tie this red ribbon to the left door handle, outside rear view mirror, or antenna of your car as a sign that you join Mothers Against Drunk Driving in our wish for a happy and safe holiday season.

Join in celebrating the holidays in a different way. Taking a cue from the "Tie A Yellow Ribbon Around The Old Oak Tree," this red ribbon will serve as a reminder not to drink and drive during the holiday season. Don't be afraid to show you care.

This may be a difficult position to take. But if we don't care enough to stand up to our friends who wrongly insist they are sober enough to drive - we take an even greater risk. We risk losing a friend, we risk the lives of others, and we risk living with the knowledge that we might have prevented a tragedy from occurring.

Help us make a difference - "Tie a red ribbon on - for love and hope and safety this holiday time."

Cats break 300 in opening round, shoot for upper division today

ERIC BROWN

Although seventh place may seem like a ho-hummer for the first round of the 14-team Texas International Golf Championships, it was anything but that for the K-State men's golf team.

The Wildcats shot a four-man score of 297 Monday in Fort Worth, Texas, their second lowest of the season. And for the first time all year, the linksters didn't fall from title contention during the opening round.

The performance has the team believing in itself again and anxious to post another solid showing tomorrow. "The team played consistent today," graduate assistant coach Len Johnsen said. "That's a start. We're moving in the right direction now."

Until Monday, K-State's first-round team scores ballooned to 310, 317 and 331. Those scores positioned them in 12th place out of 17 teams, 13th out of 15 teams and 18th out of 23 teams in respective tournaments.

"At least we're not in a position where we're just trying to jump back into it," Johnsen said.

A better first round isn't the only thing the Cats have on their side, though. Every K-Stater shot a score below his average, and all five cracked the 80-stroke barrier. The top three scorers for K-State - Richard Laing, Brett Vuillemin and Bill Graham - tied with rounds of 74.

The five players sliced a total of 21.5 strokes from their individual stroke averages.

Graham, a senior, has put together a string of good tournament showings. He led the team and placed third at the Iowa State Cyclone Fall Classic on Oct. 20.

The meet was originally scheduled for two rounds Monday, but the opening round was canceled because of a frost delay. The round will not be made up, and the team's final round will be played today.

In the 70s

Five K-State golfers shot rounds in the mid-70s Monday to give the Wildcats a four-man score of 297 in the first round of the Texas International Golf Championships in Fort Worth, Tex. The Cats second-lowest round of the season put them in seventh place heading into today's final round.

Eagles keep Giants' number

Defense flusters another quarterback in 30-7 victory

By the Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — No matter who plays quarterback for the New York Giants, Reggie White, Clyde Simmons and the Philadelphia defense always seem to have his number.

The victim Monday night was Jeff Hostetler (15) instead of Phil Simms (11), but the result was the same, a 30-7 Philadelphia victory that put the playoff hopes of the defending Super Bowl champions in severe peril.

Jim McMahon and Keith Jackson chipped in with a 73-yard touchdown connection, and James Joseph ran for 11- and 1-yard touchdowns as the Eagles won for the sixth time in the last seven meetings with the Giants and left both teams at 4-5.

McMahon was 16-for-26 for 229 yards as the Eagles ended a four-game losing streak that began when he injured a knee in Washington on Sept. 30. The Philadelphia running game, averaging only 67 yards a game coming in, ground out 137 yards, mostly on two second-half drives that lasted over nine minutes each.

But the key was a defense that sacked Hostetler four times and forced a fumble that set up one of Roger Ruzek's three field goals. Simmons and White each had sacks against an offense that had allowed only 13 sacks in its first eight games and none in the last two.

Putting constant pressure on Hostetler, they held New York without a first down for the opening 17 minutes.

And they allowed the Giants only 87 yards until Hostetler, who was 9-for-17 for 142 yards, connected with Odessa Turner for 55 yards late in the third quarter to set up Rodney Hampton's 1-yard touchdown leap that cut Philadelphia's lead to 20-7.

regular season.

Joseph, a rookie from Auburn who had just 18 yards in 11 carries all season, got 41 of his 68 total yards on a 67-yard drive to set up Ruzek's 35-yard field goal that made it 23-7 with 8:13 left. Joseph had replaced Keith Byars, who bruised his back.

Joseph went over again from the 1 with 3:19 left after Jerome Brown stopped Hostetler at his own 36 on fourth down, a yard short of a first down.

After a sluggish first quarter in which neither team could move, the Eagles took over in the second to take a 13-0 lead at halftime.

They started slowly, taking a 3-0 lead on Ruzek's 38-yard field goal at the end of a 39-yard, 9-play drive marked by completions of 15 and 17 yards from McMahon to Fred Barnett.

Then, after the Giants finally got their first first down 12:42 into the second quarter, the Eagles struck suddenly.

On a second-and-eight from his own 27, McMahon sidestepped a blitzing Steve DeOssie and found Jackson alone at the New York 45 behind Lawrence Taylor. Jackson outran Taylor to the end zone to complete the 73-yard play.

Then Seth Joyner sacked Hostetler, knocking the ball loose for White to recover. That set up Ruzek's field goal that made it 13-0.

The Eagles started the second half with a 15-play, 70-yard drive capped by Joseph's touchdown run, the first of his NFL career. That drive consumed 9:05 and included a 5-yard fourth-down completion from McMahon to Jackson at the New York 26.

The Giants, who haven't been shut out in the regular season since 1980, finally scored, with Hostetler's first-down strike to Turner and a pass interference call in the end zone leading to Hampton's score.

NFL's close calls dominant for day

'Hail Marys,' late field goals decide outcomes

By the Associated Press

It was that "any given Sunday" in the NFL. The Atlanta Falcons won on a usually impossible desperation pass and eight of the 11 losers had a chance to win in the waning minutes.

Of the 11 games played Sunday, eight weren't decided until the final two minutes or later. Two games went into overtime. In addition to the Billy Joe Tolliver to Michael Haynes game-winning for the Falcons over the San Francisco 49ers, there were two other successful "Hail Mary" passes.

The Tolliver to Haynes connection, which Haynes caught on the ground in a "jump ball" situation, gave the Falcons a 17-14 victory. It came 52 seconds after Steve Bono found John Taylor from 30 yards to give San Francisco the lead.

The New York Jets also scored on a 50-yard "Hail Mary" at the end of the half against the Green Bay Packers.

The Los Angeles Rams had less luck with long-distance heaves in their 24-17 loss to the New Orleans Saints.

Jim Everett's potential game-tying 50 yard pass in the last seconds was intercepted by Vince Buck at the goal line. New Orleans' victory margin was a 31-yard touchdown pass from Steve Walsh to Wesley Carroll through the hands of two Los Angeles defenders with four seconds left in the half.

The Washington Redskins and the Jets each won in overtime. The Redskins (9-0) beat Houston 16-13 to remain the league's only unbeaten team.

Price hopes for old form

Injuries, sickness slowed Sooner during Big 8 season

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

High expectations were placed on Brent Price before he ever set foot in Oklahoma's Lloyd Noble Arena.

Price was a local product—a native of Enid, Okla. He was a returning hero, transferred from South Carolina, where he was one of the best guards in the Metro Conference. And he was the younger brother of another Oklahoma legend, Mark Price, an NBA star with the Cleveland Cavaliers.

Price was supposed to step in immediately and be a star for the Sooners.

He did at the start. On Dec. 15, 1990, the Sooners met Loyola-Marymount in their annual run-and-gun shootout. Price carried the biggest weapon that night. He exploded for 56 points, including seven consecutive three-pointers.

If expectations were high before the game, they were out of sight afterwards.

Those expectations set Price up for a hard fall. His shooting slumped. He struggled with walking pneumonia and minor injuries in the second half of the season. He was accused of taking ill-advised shots. As the Sooners struggled, Price tried to do too much.

"It was frustrating that such high expectations were on me and there was nothing I could do about it," Price said. "And then came the 56-point game, and from then on, it seemed like nothing was good enough."

Price still went on to finish second on the team behind Jeff Webster with 17.5 points per game and led the squad in assists and steals, while tying a school record with 91 three-pointers. But critics pointed to his low shooting percentage (35.7) in the Big Eight and

Tie could give Cornhuskers an advantage

Orange Bowl representative won't carry clout

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — That 19-19 tie Colorado and Nebraska fought to in the cold and wind Saturday did nothing to enhance the Big Eight's national prestige.

It did nothing to help the Orange Bowl's selection committee, either.

The Orange Bowl Committee has the option of picking its own Big Eight representative if the race ends in a tie. And if Nebraska and Colorado both continue unbeaten through the last three conference games, that could mean Nebraska getting the bid.

The Huskers, ranked No. 11 this week, are three notches ahead of No. 14 Colorado. Plus, the Huskers, by winning the rest of their games, would have only one loss and one tie, where Colorado would have two losses to go with its tie.

Harper Davidson, chairman of the Orange Bowl Committee, said Monday the highest rated team probably would spend New Year's Day in Miami.

"There are a lot of factors we consider. The one we might weigh the most would be the highest ranked team at the time we make the decision," Davidson said during the Big Eight's weekly coaches teleconference.

"Either Colorado or Nebraska are attractive," he said. "Both are good teams. Nebraska, probably, if they (win the rest of their games) would have the better chance to be in the Top 10."

Complicating the mix even further is the fact that bowl bids this year can be extended on Nov. 16 and Nebraska finishes its season with Oklahoma on Nov. 29, a week after Colorado. The possibility will exist that Nebraska could get the bid and then be upset at home by the always-dangerous Sooners, No. 20 this week.

"Anybody who considers the Orange Bowl is going to have to look at it as either Nebraska or Colorado," Davidson said. "They'll hope we don't end up with a No. 12 Big Eight champion."

Colorado coach Bill McCartney doubts his team would get the bid if neither the Huskers nor Buffs get upset. "Probably not," he said. "In light of the fact we were there the last two years, certainly that would be taken into strong consideration. Plus, there's the fact that Nebraska has lost only one game and we lost two. By virtue of that, they should be given the inside track."

Without a doubt, the Huskers are the ones who control their own fate.

"I would assume that if we were able to win our next three, that we would be the logical choice," Nebraska coach Tom Osborne said. "I guess we are in a position where it would appear we're in good shape to control our destiny. But we've got our work cut out for us."

It was not on national television and it had no effect on Orange Bowl pairings, but Iowa State's 23-22 victory over a Missouri team that was favored by 12 points said a lot about the Cyclones' grit.

Coach Jim Walden's team was quickly running out of quarterbacks and defensive backs before the game was out of the first quarter. Two starting defensive backs went out with injuries, and the Cyclones already were down to their third-team quarterback.

But Kevin Caldwell made maximum use of a new run-oriented offense Walden installed on an emergency basis and plans to use the rest of the way.

"People say it's boring as hell, but I'm trying to win for my players," Walden said. "But winning is not boring, so I guess that's OK."

Missouri quarterback Phil Johnson threw for 270 yards against the Cyclones but suffered a lick on the head that seemed serious enough to send him to the hospital as a precaution.

"He had some headaches yesterday," Missouri coach Bob Stull said. "We will keep him out of practice today, but I think he will be all right."

SPORTS BRIEFLY

Olympic trials could be moved

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — The Louisiana governor's race, which pits former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard David Duke against former Gov. Edwin Edwards, could bump the 1992 Olympic trials out of New Orleans.

"I am very, very concerned," said Dr. Marvin Trail, chairman of the New Orleans Sports Foundation, which won the trials for the city. "The executive committee was in town last weekend and in talking to some of the members, I have to tell you that they are very worried about it."

"They won't interfere in our business, but they are concerned about it." The event, expected to have a $29.7 million impact on the city's economy, is scheduled for June 19-28 at Tad Gormley Stadium, which is undergoing a $7 million renovation.

At last weekend's U.S. Olympic Congress meeting at Colorado Springs, Colo., TAC officials said they were concerned Duke might beat Edwards in the Nov. 16 runoff.

"It's a hypothetical situation right now," TAC president Frank Greenberg was quoted as saying in Monday's editions of The New York Times. "Let's see what happens."

The Times reported that another official, who was not identified, said a contingency plan already was being assembled in case Duke wins. A TAC spokesman denied that Monday.

"The situation is being watched, but nothing has changed on it," said a TAC spokesman who also did not want to be identified.

Any decision to change the location of the event would be made at TAC's annual meeting Dec. 3-7 in New Orleans, the spokesman said. "But it would be self-defeating. There's a little over six months now before the trials," the spokesman said.

Filling it up

Oklahoma sharpshooter Brent Price is hoping to make amends for a disappointing Big Eight season with the Sooners in 1991. Price scored 56 points in a non-conference game against Loyola-Marymount, but battled injuries and walking pneumonia the second half of the season.

Oklahoma's failure to make the NCAA Tournament.

"It was a matter of circumstance," Price said. "Hopefully, I'll take what I learned from last year and use it this year."

Things already look to be different for Price and the Sooners. Coach Billy Tubbs said he is determined to make Price the full-time point guard, allowing him to direct the offense and relieving him of some of the scoring load. Price said the point position is more suitable to his style of play.

"I'm excited about getting to play the point more," Price said. "I like to play with the ball in my hands. Then if I'm not getting the shots, I can get the ball to people who are."

for freshmen during orientation. Programs like this go to the heart of the problem.

What changes would you make in the office of president?

The next student body president of K-State is going to have to be someone who can take the heat that the office brings. Someone has to bring responsibility back to the office rather than blaming others for "faulty advice." If it's faulty advice, don't take it in the first place.

What do you think makes you the best person for the office of president?

A good understanding of all issues facing students. Also, good communication skills developed through two years of working at Manhattan's Homeless Shelter. I also figure my sense of humor can't hurt me. Maybe all Joan Finney needs to take K-State seriously is to hear a student body president crack a killer joke.

What do you think is the most important issue on the minds of K-State students?

That they feel that SGA is a joke. The challenge will be for the new government to work on attainable goals to regain faith and trust from the people it's supposed to represent.

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed, but wasn't?

Campus security has always been an issue during SGA elections. My question is why don't we (instead of putting up lights and cameras) adopt a mandatory rape awareness program address the issue of involving a greater number of students from diverse backgrounds and campus organizations. It is necessary to build a stronger cooperation and communication network between all campus groups to fully address all student concerns.

What changes would you make in the office of president?

Student government is supposed to be a service — and the person we elect is supposed to be a student rather than a politician. I would like to focus my efforts and the efforts of my cabinet on serving student needs. If I am elected, I will devote as much time to meeting students and discussing concerns during my term as I have while campaigning.

What do you think makes you the best person for the office of president?

Through my two terms as a College of Agriculture Student Senator and my involvement in the National Conference on Faith and Values in Leadership at strategic planning meetings and as a leadership staff member, I have gained the experience and leadership necessary to serve student concerns — on the campus, state and national levels.

Student government works only when it truly represents all students. Please be sure to vote today or Wednesday in the Union.

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed, but wasn't?

Fred Wingert

tant issues face K-State, but we cannot sit back and let the quality of our education slip.

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed, but wasn't?

This past year, I would have liked to see the implementation of a campus shuttle system to alleviate the campus parking problem. I have encouraged and will continue asking for the administration to look into pursuing federal grant money to purchase more electric vans like the one in use by the K-State engineering department. A number of these vans could be tested on a campus shuttle system.

What changes would you make in the office of president?

Although many positive aspects exist in the office of student body president, many changes need to also be made. Currently, I believe the office of president needs to regain the confidence and trust of the students. In order to do that, I want to continue to visit with groups of students and individuals to hear their concerns during and after the election.

What do you think makes you the best person for office of president?

When I began this campaign, I started by asking students what they thought were the issues facing K-State. I made those priorities my priorities, which I will continue to do as your student body president. I have the experience of being involved with student government and in many diverse groups across campus, but most importantly, I will work to accomplish the goals we set together as students.

With this term being a three-semester term, we will have the ability to follow up on these issues, as well as the other issues of concern to K-State's students.

What changes would you make in the office of president?

The student body president should spend more time with the students on campus addressing their needs and concerns and less time on trips. On campus, issues need to have a higher priority for the president. The president appoints cabinet members who are knowledgeable on state and national lobbying.

While the president does have a role in lobbying for pertinent issues affecting K-State students, the primary concern of the president should be here with the students. Anything more than one trip to Washington, D.C., by the president each year is wasteful showboating. Furthermore, the student body president needs a strict open-door and full-disclosure policy.

What do you think is the most important issue on the minds of K-State students?

Every time we go through fee payment at the beginning of the semester, we are required to pay increased tuition and fees. However, when K-State students may need a service or class, we often find that both are being continually cut. These actions cannot justify our increased tuition and fees. Where have our representatives been through all of this?

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed, but wasn't?

1) We have had very poor follow-up on the academic minors program.
2) We need to streamline the financial aid process so students can receive their money on time.

Roy Cessna

What changes would you make in the office of president?

To increase communications and encourage student participation in SGA, invitation open-door policy between the office of president and the student body. I also would establish accountability as well as credibility for SGA's actions.

What do you think makes you the best person for the office of president?

I have the experience as a former senator and student body president of Dodge City Community College. I have been on the legislative affairs committee and have lobbied in Topeka for state funding for the students of K-State. I have the experience and knowledge to redirect the SGA into an organization that focuses on the needs of the student body.

What do you think is the most important issue on the minds of K-State students?

Probably the most important issue on the students' minds is the lack of "accountability" that the SGA has portrayed to the student body. The lack of a minors degree program at K-State and the important issues pressing the students today.

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed, but wasn't?

The student government hasn't addressed the issue of the integration of the student body of the K-State-Salina campus into the SGA structure. Also, the minors degree program needs to be addressed more seriously than in the previous administration.

SGA can actually accomplish something for a change. Instead of trips to Topeka and D.C., which waste more student money, let us concentrate on the immediate campus. Let's pressure the administration in Anderson Hall to fix our neglected campus by rallying, striking, etc. I'll be glad to lead the charge.

Students, ask Fred Wingert why he resigned as chief of staff two years ago. Blessed with this opportunity to make a difference as a student leader, he let us down when he went off to pursue his own desires. Presidential material? Not!

Jackie, as vice chairwoman of Senate, you should have made sure those who cost the students money were punished. You did nothing. Will you neglect the students as SBP?

Craig, you did a fine job as finance committee chairman, yet when you uncovered the furniture fiasco, you should have kept pounding until the students' rights were preserved.

Roy and Shawn, you would make fine presidents because SGA has not rotted your brains.

Why am I better? I don't know if I am, but I am not involved in the present corrupted SGA. To those football and basketball fans, the $9-reduced price for both tickets was an idea I initiated and pushed through. As just a peon student, I helped many students. If elected, I will reject a presidential salary of $3,600 a year and donate it to Farrell Library. Ask the others if they will do the same. When you check the ballot, don't check it for your buddy or because he looks good (If you did, I know I wouldn't stand a snowball's chance in hell). Check the box of someone who will lead students and won't be pushed around by the administration. We need someone who will get things done.

Don't look for a pretty picture here. Where I live is not stated because it does not matter. Stating my living group does one thing — provide separation, which we do not need.

Students need to join forces so the best campus and education is provided to everyone. The student body president is merely the leader of the forces.

Over the past years, student government has deteriorated to slime at best. The only way to change the situation is to rid all associated with the institution (i.e. SGA) and start anew.

Along with the renovation of the SGA office (and need I say this occurs at a time of financial and economic crisis?) the "furniture fiasco" cost every student about $5. What did we receive for our contribution? Nothing. Nice government, huh? Let us see if

What do you think is the most important issue on the minds of K-

State students?

Diverse representation in student government, not only cultural diversity but residence diversity. There are certain issues that should not be addressed by a body that represents colleges. It would be great to see a government that represents both academic and overall college life.

During the past year, what issue do you think should have been addressed but wasn't?

Actually for the past several years, the students have been interested in an academic minors program which would make them more marketable upon their graduation. That is an issue on everyone's mind in addition to representation.

What changes would you make in the office of president?

In accordance with Article IV, Section 1 of the SGA constitution, the president shall call the meetings of the K-State SGA. He or she should therefore have the power to limit their duration. I would like to change the way SGA operates in order to make it more effective and efficient.

What do you think makes you the best person for the office of president?

I have experience in money and personnel management. I have the drive, desire and will to help K-State students (all of them). The high security positions I have had in the past demand an ethical background.

For the past years, voter turnout has been extremely low (approximately 20 percent). I encourage each and every student to exercise their right and vote for their candidate of choice. Let us represent you!

While I support the Library and Rec Referendum, the Student Senate's work on these issues is done. With a short senate term, the most important issue will be allocating student funds to campus organizations. Two other important items will be to first, re-issue the proposed minors program and try to pressure the Faculty Senate to pass it also. Second, try to bring back integrity and respect to student government.

I always told myself and friends that I didn't want to be in politics. However, the events in Senate this past year have pushed me over the edge, and my desire to run for office has come. I feel someone new should get a chance at trying to be advocate of the students. I believe we need more student involvement in our Senate, both at meeting and informally in conversations with the senators themselves. I strongly urge every single person that is even slightly interested in changing or improving something here at K-State to go and voice that opinion. We all pay our fees, and we should all be heard.

I also think that in the past, some senators have used their office only for resume purposes. I think this totally defeats the purpose of having a Senate.

I could make a bold promise of a radical reformation that would drastically alter the quality of education and life at K-State. But I refuse to insult your intelligence as well as mine. I offer my ability to contemplate ideas, think through possibilities and make wise decisions. If nothing else, my only plea is for the student body to get out and vote. The voter turnout in years past has been nothing short of apathetic. Please do not complain unless you vote.

I've found the best way to make the most out of my collegiate experience is to get involved. For me, the best way I've found is involvement through student government. Over the past year, I have served as a student intern and been a member of the Communications Standing Committee.

If elected the one thing I promise is communication between myself and the student body. Too often solutions to big and little problems alike are brought to screaming halt when communication breaks down. Student government should be a representation of the students' voices. I would work hard to bring students' opinions to light and fight for what they want — be it an improved Farrell Library, a bigger Rec Complex, a shuttle system, more lights on campus or just everyday complaints. Communication is the first step in solving any problem, and by voting for me you'll be taking the first step.

K-State, as a whole, is in shambles. Class sections are being cut, vacant faculty positions are left dormant and Farrell Library is completely inadequate due to lack of funding. Also, campus crime is on the increase, safe and affordable housing in Manhattan is virtually nonexistent, and the politically hypocritical as opposed to politically correct have taken over our campus in an effort to officially begin the era of intolerance, and some say that the Rec Complex needs expansion.

As a good listener and communicator, as well as an open-minded, potentially permanent student, these are just a few of the issues as I see them. I will make students the issue in an effort to be informed, realistic and creative. Our problems are many but not insurmountable.

Spread the word! When you say Student Senate, the first issues that come to mind are the Farrell Library and the Rec Complex referendums. However, there are other issues concerning the student body that have been debated by the Senate. A few of the issues are the absence of an academic minors program and the lack of student parking.

If elected, I plan to be a voice in the Senate that will represent and inform my constituents. I was the student body president of my high school and was one of 10 American high school student leaders chosen to attend the International Student Leadership Institute, in Oberweis, West Germany. These are a few of the qualifications I could bring to the position.

Student government is an essential and vital organization for the students. I feel it is important for students to have the power to make positive changes at K-State.

I support the improvements and expansions for Farrell Library and the Rec Complex. Farrell is an issue which has been neglected, and it's time to make the overdue changes. In addition, it is important for the students to have recreational facilities that adequately meet their needs.

I also feel students would immensely benefit from a minors program. A university of this size should be attuned more to the needs of the students. Therefore, the implementation of a minors program would broaden a student's educational possibilities.

The students make K-State function and stay alive. Students are the most important key. I strongly feel that students should have good representation and their opinions and ideas should be heavily considered.

Recently, Student Senate has been bogged down with domestic and bureaucratic problems. As a student senator, I will make it my responsibility to go beyond these trivial matters and introduce and concentrate on issues more pertinent to the student body.

K-State exists because of students, as does Student Senate. We need to make the students our key issue, and that's why if elected, I will get out and talk with people, and find out what's on their minds.

I support the Farrell Library and the Rec Complex expansion. K-State needs to jump ahead into the 90s and current technology if the students plan on keeping this school's reputation of producing outstanding and quality people in force. That's why an expansion in Farrell and the Rec Complex is so important. It is a way of keeping both minds and bodies physically fit.

Having been involved with student government as a former intern and senator, I have seen vast changes made throughout the past two years. Changes have arose, such as the smoke-free Union. This issue was highly controversial, but in the end I feel the right answer was made.

A couple of issues are important to me in my bid for Arts & Sciences senator.

First of all, campus safety is an issue that is very important to every college campus. I believe that the efforts that have been made at K-State have helped out, but I think that more can be done to ensure the protection of our students.

Secondly, next semester will mark the beginning of allocations for student organizations, in which Senate is responsible for determining the amount of money they receive. For many of the organizations, these allocations are very important, and as a student senator, I will do my best to make sure each of them get the amount of money that will keep them a part of the fine system of campus organizations at K-State.

As a senator, I will to the best of my abilities be the voice of the students where their views are properly informed to the Student Senate.

Issues that I feel are vital for the future growth of the University are an academic minors program, a plus/minus system, a shuttle system for off-campus students and better communication between students and senators.

My qualifications include being a member of the Student Senate Communications Committee and a Collegian Reporter. By being a reporter, I have been exposed to students' views on various issues at the University.

I feel I have the dedication, experience and knowledge necessary to be an effective member of Student Senate.

As a student senator at K-State, I feel that it is important to represent the students at the state level as well as at the campus level. I would like to help students present their views to not only the faculty and administration of our university, but also to the legislators at the Statehouse in Topeka in an effort to secure funding for things such as the improvement of Farrell Library and maintenance and construction of campus buildings, which are the responsibility of the State of Kansas, not the students.

As your senator, I will work to implement a shuttle system to facilitate off-campus students, who are forced to drive to class. Moreover, I feel that efforts should be made to bring a minors program to K-State, as we are one of the major universities without such a program. It is my goal to bring the standards of K-State above and beyond those of our peer institutions.

A vote for me is a vote for change. I believe that in order for Student Senate to be for the student body, Senate must be reflective of and responsive to the needs and concerns of the student body. We already know this is not the case and a vote for me will be a vote toward turning this around. I can only help if I am in Senate to listen. I believe that a senator's job is to look at any situation from all angles. Because of my background and experience I can honestly say I can. My job is to work for you.

Issues I support: Expansion of Farrell Library and the Rec Complex, shuttle bus system and improved lighting on campus outskirts.

These are very common issues that most everyone supports. The issues that I feel distinguish myself from other College of Arts and Sciences candidates are the following: Increased interaction between student government and the athletic director's office, keeping Farrell Library open later on weekends so students will have access to materials that they often need in doing weekend assignments, reduced price of season basketball and football tickets and reinstating campout for basketball tickets.

The reasons I am running are twofold. First, I have a strong desire to "clean up" student government. I feel that the past Student Senates have been unresponsive at times to student concerns.

Second, I am running because I am concerned about lack of representation in Senate of those who live in residence halls. Currently, students who live in residence halls are about as well represented in student government as blacks in South Africa's government.

I believe we should enlarge both the Rec Complex and Farrell Library while we have the funding. Students can only benefit from this, especially since student fees would not be increased. Why wait for something that is needed right now? I hope students will support both referendums by voting "Yes."

I'm running for a student senator position in the College of Arts and Sciences. I currently live in Ford Hall.

The establishment of a minors program is a policy that would benefit the entire student body here at K-State. While this was a concern of the past, it has been forgotten in the past few years. If elected to Student Senate, as one of your arts and sciences senators, my primary goal is to begin the necessary steps toward the implementation of a minors program. It is also another goal of mine to open myself to the students and to involve the entire campus in the governing of our university. These are a few of my concerns, yet if elected, I would be open to any proposals of my constituents.

Two very important issues facing the student body are the renovation of Farrell Library and the expansion of the Rec Complex. I fully support both referendums because the improvements have been needed for quite some time. The students, however, need to realize that voting "yes" will not raise their fees. By voting "yes," students will know exactly where their money is going rather than leaving the decisions to others.

I feel another issue that is important is the establishment of a minor degree program. Presently, a student is forced to either declare a double major or have an "emphasis" in whatever they wish to study. There is quite a difference in the number of courses taken between the two. A minor's program would give students another option when selecting areas of study. Implementing this program would also bring K-State up to par with the other Big Eight schools.

I believe that Student Senate as of late has become too political in its thinking. Senate should be more interested in helping the students rather than advancing the senators' own agendas.

After having served as a student senator for one full term, I never even questioned whether I would run again. True, there have been times in the past 11 months that I have been tired, frustrated and even disillusioned with student government.

But, instead of feeling burned out with the system, this just tells me that there are still problems to solve and work to be done. I'm a believer in "If it's not perfect yet, keep trying."

We as students at K-State have nearly unlimited opportunities to keep trying when we find imperfections. Through student government, we can bring about needed changes in the structure of our University's services, academic opportunities and even student government. This year I have seen the beginnings of progress, and I don't want to quit until those beginnings become realities. I believe in progress, and I believe in student government.

For the past year I've served as a Student Senate intern and have been a very vocal participant in many debates over issues such as the student body president term length, of which I opposed the extension.

One issue that I would like to see take up as a student senator is that of the paradox that we, as students, find ourselves in almost every year. Each year it seems as though our fees and/or our tuition goes up, and our course options and curricula shrink! We need to start speaking up for our rights and let the State of Kansas, as well as the administration, know that we will not tolerate cutbacks in our University. If they are truly concerned about education, let them make cuts elsewhere, not at K-State! We need to demand a clearly visible increase in student services if our fees and/or our tuition continue to rise as they have been doing each year.

In my opinion, the current student senators have forgotten that their job as senators is to represent the views of the student body. Instead, they behave as if they were elected because they are wiser than everyone else, and they know what is best for the rest of us. I believe this is wrong and it needs to change. I want to represent the students of K-State, their interests and their views. I think this is the issue. I don't know what most people think about what is going on at K-State, but if elected, I'll damn well find out.

Although many students believe University reorganization is dead, the administration is still rumbling about diverting funds to make strong programs such as agriculture and applied sciences stronger. Possibly, the funds for this will come from the "weak" programs, many of which are housed in the College of Arts & Sciences. If I were elected senator, one of my main concerns would be to fight this type of reorganization. Already, students returned this year to find tuition costs higher and class availability lower. Reorganizing funding to the stronger programs could only heighten this problem and lower the quality of education you and I are receiving.

I feel a minors program would be especially helpful for Arts & Sciences students who often double major because they don't feel an area of emphasis sends a strong enough message to potential employers.

If elected to the position of the College of Arts & Sciences senator, there are several issues I would address. Having served on a university cultural diversity committee, I feel this issue needs increased student awareness. In our University, the leadership positions are maintained mainly by traditional students, causing the non-traditional students' views to be overlooked. A goal of mine would be to emphasize these students' voices and roles on campus in Student Senate.

I would like to take charge in implementing an academic minors program. This would not only aid students, but would also serve as a recruiting tool making K-State one of the only state institutions with this distinction.

As well as the above issues, Farrell Library and Rec Complex expansions are also issues of foremost importance to students that I would like to entertain.

I was raised in a family of K-State alumni and friends who helped exemplify Purple Pride, and that same feeling rubbed off on me. That is why it is very disheartening to hear of people who are disenfranchised with this University because of various problems of which you are well aware. I am talking about problems such as Farrell Library, campus safety, parking and class cancellations. It is no wonder enrollment is dropping when grave problems such as these exist. I am not going to pretend that I will take care of these problems single-handedly, because whoever promises this is either a fabulous dreamer or an outright liar.

As a result of my dedication to this University, I've been involved in residence hall government, either directly or indirectly, since I arrived here more than two years ago. If elected arts and sciences senator, I would be a passionate proponent of activities or organizations contributing to the cultivation and diversification of K-State. As a life-long Manhattan resident and K-State supporter, I've been thoroughly familiarized with the numerous strengths and comparatively few weaknesses of the university. Combating these weaknesses starts with the Student Senate. If elected, one of my chief aims would be to redirect spending priorities from purchases tangential to the fundamental development of K-State (e.g. new SGA furniture) to neglected activities whose welfare is tied inextricably to the welfare of the University. Furthermore, if worse came to worse and penny-pinching Topeka became an imperative, I would probably have as much influence as any student in the state. I have a solid background in politics and was recently appointed by the governor to chair her new college student board of advisors. (That's not to say that I agree with all of her views!)

When I ran for Manhattan City Commission last spring, I wanted to give students a voice where they have none. I suppose that is again my goal. Senate has a great untapped potential for representing students.

This Senate will deal with some key issues which affect all students. One of these will be developing a policy for funding religious and partisan groups. I am the acting chairman of the committee investigating this question, and we are now at a point where a policy must be made. The process of allocating money to campus organizations the one area in which students have true influence at K-State and the senate must be responsible in making those decisions.

We need to stop making Senate a clique and start making it click.

Todd Fertig

Residence Hall

The job of a student senator is to represent fellow students in the decision making process of the university. To effectively do this, the senator must first truly understand the desires and needs of the student. The most important thing a senator can do is have close contact with students and pay close attention to their opinions.

I am proud of the initiative K-State students have shown recently in funding building and improvement projects. I feel, however, that a bad precedent has been set by the state, which expects students to shoulder a larger than normal portion of the funding burden. I would like for the state's awareness of the university's needs to be improved.

Senators need to seek greater awareness of students' opinions in decisions over allocations. Greater care must be taken in ensuring that personal bias does not play a role in funding. Equal representation must be afforded to all groups concerned in the allocations process.

One of the main concerns of students that seems to get swept aside each year is the issue of an academic minors program. To truly represent students, senate must take an honest look into the possibility of such a program.

Students at K-State are constantly being bombarded with changes in the University. Right now, a major change concerns the status of Farrell Library and the Rec Complex. For K-State students to compete successfully in academics, the library needs an overhaul. I've set involvement in Student Senate as an intermediate goal in hopes that the future will bring deeper involvement in Student Government. Participation in SGA is a large step in the political process here at Kansas State. There is much to be learned from participation in campus leadership groups. I'm wanting and willing to learn from participation in SGA. As students of K-State, we comprise the basic components for our Student Senate. Participation by all students in SGA is simply not possible due to other commitments and concerns. As a college of business student senator, I would deem it necessary to listen to the concerns of students and provide feedback in Senate meetings not just from my own views, but from a wider spectrum of those in the college of business. This statement is going to require a lot of commitment on my part. In order that I am correctly educated on the wishes of the business majors, I am willing to make the commitment necessary to make our Student Senate work for everyone.

There are many issues that need to be dealt with campus wide. Three of the more important issues to me are allocations of funds, campus safety and the library and recreation center expansions.

With the upcoming term being shortened to a semester, most Senate meetings will be dealing with the allocation of funds. I would make sure that all of the funds are distributed fairly in order to assure an upward movement for the campus and for that of the College of Business.

A second issue that deserves some attention is campus safety. There have been some things done to make the campus safer like more lights and pamphlets to let people know where the emergency call boxes are, but there is more that can be done.

There are several issues that will face the newly-elected Senate. The short-term Senate must distribute funds to groups in a fair and decisive manner. This will take a lot of maturity on behalf of the young Senate. I feel that I am capable of making these decisions. Farrell Library and the rec complex, although separate issues, should both be passed. Their passage will not increase fees already paid by students. It will merely redirect funds that are already paid. If these issues fail to pass they will probably not come up again for quite some time, and the funds will be redirected into other projects or lost altogether. Therefore, I support the passage of both of these bills. I would also like to play a role in the increase of safety on campus.

Nicole Marmet

Greek Sophomore in business administration

My name is Nicole Marmet, and I am a sophomore in Business Finance. I am running for business senator, because Senate is a place for students to express their ideas and concerns. Since I have served on Student Senate this past year as an intern, I have the experience needed to address these concerns. It is important for students to select a candidate that has the experience, time and dedication to devote to Student Senate. I believe I gained this experience by working on the Legislative Committee and attending all the Student Senate and Intern meetings. Being present during allocations last year makes me understand the need for informed senators who could insure students that their fees were being properly spent.

There are many changes in store for K-State in the next few years. It is important for student leaders to have enthusiasm and creativity to see K-State through these changes. Senators should be responsible and able to communicate these changes to their constituents. I feel I possess these qualities. My top priority if elected is to make sure the needs of the students are met.

Issues supported: Farrell Library referendum, rec complex, shuttle bus system, improved lighting on the outskirts of campus, reinstatement of campout, reduced football/basketball ticket prices and greater interaction between athletes and the rest of the student body.

Why I am running: I am running for Student Senate for several reasons. First, I think ethics need to be infused into Senate, and I believe that I will be able to do that because of my honesty, integrity and desire to serve the students of KSU.

Secondly, I feel that Senate needs to be more accountable to the students. If elected, I will ask students how they want me to vote on the issues. I want to be a representative, not a self-styled politician who knows all the right answers.

I feel Student Senate needs to cater to the needs of the student. I would actively seek the opinions and needs of the students of our college and express those views to the senate. I would also take an active role in assuring that Kansas State University and the College of Business remains one of the best learning institutions in the country by aggressively lobbying our state legislators. Our legislators are directly responsible for the cut in classes and the headaches at financial aid. Students need to be informed of who's voting how and to make wholesale changes at election time if the legislators do not want to represent us.

Todd Gentry

The results of the library and rec center expansion issues will require aggressive follow up by Student Senate whichever way the referendum comes out. I feel that this follow up should be given high priority. The work of the campus safety committee should also remain a high priority with the next generation of senators. Finally, I feel that the pricing structure of the K-State Union should be examined to insure that the Union offers competitive prices on both food and non-food items, as it is student money with which the Union is run.

Larry Hackleman

Not Listed Senior in architectural engineering

Two important referendums are before the student body at this time - the Farrell Library renovation and expansion as well as the Rec Complex expansion. Both of which I fully support. I think it is very important for the student body to realize that neither issue will raise our fees.

Voting "yes" for Farrell Library is a must if we truly want a better library. We have been saying for several years we want and need an improved Farrell. Now the time has come to put our money where our mouth is. An anonymous commitment of $2 million was made for Farrell and the Essential Edge campaign would provide another $3 million. We can show strong support and move a step closer to actually improving our library.

Voting "yes" for the Rec Complex would increase the size of the rec and help catch up with the demand for rec services. The rec was built by students, for the students, and we should continue supporting the facility.

I feel that one of the most important issues of this campaign is making sure that the senators elected are responsible, hard working and as experienced as possible. Due to the shortened term, this Senate will have to get on its feet quicker and take care of many issues in only six months. That is a large part of why I will also be running for Chairperson of Senate. The library and rec center referendums are important issues of the election, but the responsibility of the next Senate is to follow up on the referendums and assure that they are properly administered. It is more important than ever to elect an entire student government that will have the highest integrity and will not try to circumvent the system of rules we have established. Those rules were made by students, for students and we should never again have to deal with them being completely and blatantly ignored.

Michelle Munson

Residence Hall Freshman in chemical engineering

K-State is one of the few universities in the country that offers the diversity of a large public institution, and yet maintains a close-knit friendly atmosphere. I genuinely believe that K-State is one of the best public institutions in the country. However, I realize that maintaining this excellence is not possible without significant increases in state funding, adequate university facilities, and most importantly, a student government that is responsive to students needs and responsible with their money. Considering this and the shortness of the coming term, we need a Student Senate of accountable leaders who are ready to set priorities and adhere to them. These priorities must include getting immediate relief in state funding, following up on the library and rec referendums as promised, and empowering, rather than overpowering the student. With a broad understanding of the university, leadership experience, and a conscientious attitude, I believe I could be part of such a Senate and would sincerely appreciate your vote.

Ben Clouse

Greek Freshman in electrical engineering

I chose to run for Student Senate because I think the priorities of senate have been misguided in the past. I want the respect and trust of the students to be returned to student government. I would be committed to regaining this trust and respect. Currently, there is a lack of commitment to this vital cause both nationally and even right here at KSU. I hope to change this attitude. As a student senator I could help direct student funds toward education and also lobby state legislators to direct funds toward education as well.

The role of Student Senate should be to seed out the needs of students and find ways to fulfill these needs. If elected, this will be my primary goal-to accomplish what students want to see accomplished. Steps have finally been taken to improve our library and recreation complex. We still need to work on a minor degree program and a solution to the parking problem. If elected, I want to know your concerns and needs and do whatever I can to fulfill them. What your wants matters. Student Government is for you, the students.

Marc Scarbrough

Greek Junior in electrical engineering

As a Student Senate candidate for the College of Engineering, I presently support both the Library and Recreation Facility referendums. However, these issues will be determined before the next Senate term begins, therefore I must look to the issues that will affect our University next semester. Such issues that I feel will be important to the students are the possible implementation of a minors program, implementation of a shuttle system to solve the parking problem, continued improvements of campus safety and the possibility of campus re-organization.

I feel that a Student Senator should represent both his/her college and his/her University. I hope to gain input from a large number of students through my activities in various organizations such as Tau Beta Pi, Engineering Ambassadors, and my position as a lab T.A. in the Physics Department. Making the students' desires known, such as a possible smoking room in the Union, and listening to the students is important to me. I also hope to become more active in lobbying for increased University funding at the state level.

In three years at K-State I have lived in a dorm, off-campus and in a fraternity. I know the views of the students from all perspectives. I also know the current issues affecting us now; the library, the rec complex, even the illuminating engineering society's drive to receive the same allocations it did last year.

Does a good senator actively participate in debate to be or the can help their respective college as best as possible?

I want what you, the engineering student, want - Kansas State University and the college of engineering to maintain or improve its current standard. I can help you when it comes to allocations and issues affecting our campus.

Does a good senator have experience that qualifies him or her to represent their college?

Before Kansas State, I served as student body president of my high school - a good beginning background. Since then I have served the college of engineering as an ambassador and three semesters on the Kansas State Engineer magazine, and was the Outstanding Sophomore in IE last year.

I am running for the Board of Student Publications, Inc. because of my concern over the financial difficulties of the corporation. Student fees were increased last spring by $7.80/year to purchase approximately $500,000 worth of new computer and printing equipment. After exhausting this equipment reserve, the corporation was facing a projected $50,000 loss for this last fiscal year, however, due to a loan, increased advertising campaign and budget cuts, the loss was minimized to approximately $15,000.

My main interest in becoming a board member is to protect the fiscal contribution made by all K-State students (approximately $300,000 annually) to the corporation. Students cannot be expected to continually support this corporation through increased student fees when we all face difficult economic times.

I also want the board to pass a policy requiring the Collegian to publish all letters to the editor. The Collegian is a newspaper for K-State students and all students should have the right to have their opinions heard in addition to those of the Collegian editorial staff.

Senior in journalism and mass communications

My name is Brian W. Kratzer, and I am running for a position on the Board of Student Publications.

First, my most important qualification is I am an employee of Student Publications Inc. I work in the Collegian newsroom daily in a profession for which I care deeply. I care what the board decides with my life.

I have been working as a photojournalist on the staffs of the Collegian and Royal Purple since fall 1988. I and photo edited the 1991 Royal Purple. My dedication to these two national-award-winning publications is the main reason I am running for the board. I also feel that Student Publications employees who are affected every day by the decisions of the board should be included in your vote.

Tom Alberg
Off Campus
Senior in radio-television

The Collegian and the Royal Purple are among the best in the country. As a member of the Board of Student Publications, I feel it is extremely important to maintain the quality which we have always upheld. These publications keep K-State in the public eye as a top educational institution. In addition to my experience on the board, I have worked on campus in both print and broadcast media. My other leadership qualifications include being president of the Society for Collegiate Journalists and treasurer of the Arts and Science Council. My experience ensures I have the capability and knowledge which is necessary to best serve the board.

Susan Lind

Junior in journalism and mass communications

Since I am currently serving as an Arts and Sciences senator and having worked in the Collegian advertising staff as an intern, I believe I would be a qualified and insightful member of the board.

The Royal Purple and the Collegian are nationally recognized publications, and both have earned the highest honors in their field. Therefore, it is crucial to continue this degree of success into the future. I have the knowledge, desire and experience to hold this position. If elected, I will work to maintain the financial stability of this organization as well as fairly choosing the most qualified leaders to run K-State's student publications.

Justin Apprill

My name is Justin Apprill and I am running for Student Senate in the College of Engineering. I am a member of Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity.

The major issues at hand right now are of course the recreation center and the Farrell Library. I am totally in favor of improving both of these facilities. Many other buildings around campus also need improvement. If elected, I will support the needed improvements.

Another important issue is the possibility of adopting a minors program. If minors were offered, it might attract more students to KSU. Having to take just a few more hours to get a minor in an area would be much simpler than having to go a whole extra year to get a second degree. If elected, I will support the minors program, as well as other programs that will help in the improvement.

I have represented my fellow constituents as an engineering senator for the past year, and I feel my experience will help me in making strong and good decisions concerning our school's issues and in representing our students' opinions.

I believe a superior academic program at Kansas State University is extremely important to maintain. Therefore, I truly support the repair and expansion of the Farrell Library and the Recreation Complex. I am also in great favor of adopting an academic minors program. By doing so, we can help enhance our students' background for future employers and further schooling opportunities.

If re-elected, I will try to represent my fellow students to the best of my capabilities and I will strive to voice the students' opinions as best as I can, because it's important to me that our students be heard.

Sophomore in engineering technology

My name is Raja Patel. I am a third year engineering student from Atwood, Kansas. While at K-State I have been involved in numerous activities ranging from being a social chairman in my residence hall to participating in Society of Manufacturing Engineers.

I feel that with my experiences I can bring a new perspective to Student Senate. I am aware of the problems currently facing students, such as: Farrell Library, Rec. Complex, budgets cuts leading to class and staff reductions, and especially important to engineers—making sure our engineering fee is spent in areas of need. Students need representation in Student Senate to ensure that problems like these are being addressed.

I feel that I can provide "True representation for students."

Having been here at K-State for three years in civil engineering, I've heard all the negative and positive comments about student government. It's true that some students believe Senate is just a bunch of self-concerned tyrants, but I feel that I could help change this attitude. If elected, I would strive to serve you, the student, by making decisions based on your needs and concerns. Currently, I'm staff on an engineering floor at Goodnow Hall, which I feel helps keep me in tune with issues in engineering, while providing needed qualities for Student Senate. Once again, the issues of funding student groups and programs will be dealt with during a shortened term. These issues and those involving the library, recreation complex, and the recycling program are one which your vote allowing me the chance to handle the responsibilities of office and to serve you.

Anyone who reads the Collegian or Royal Purple has probably seen the cutbacks. I have been on both sides, as a reader and on the production end. I feel this gives me objectivity to respond to cutbacks. Nobody can promise there won't be any. But by being on the Board of Student Publications, I want the students to get the best service possible and to keep them in mind when decisions are made.

The K-State State Collegian and the Royal Purple are among the top student publications in the country. In order to maintain this level of excellence, I feel it is detrimental that the Board of Student Publications is made up of the most qualified individuals. I have had the opportunity to objectively read and enjoy both and if elected will strive to ensure the continued success of our campus publications.

Christopher Assaf

Vote for me — Christopher T. Assaf. Why? Because I want to be a public official elected by my peers.

Other than that, I am qualified. There are currently only two people who have worked longer than I for the Collegian or Royal Purple.

As current photo editor for the Collegian, past photo editor for the Royal Purple and a staff photographer for both since fall 1987, I have been intimate with the problems we have had financially and with equipment. I have not just heard about these problems and passed judgement on them from a newly remodeled office or meeting room across the street, but have been there when the system crashes (notice plural) on deadline, furniture falls apart or when we have to cut positions this semester because we do not have enough money to pay someone. I see people putting in 60-hour weeks to do a job three people did in past years. All these factors hurt our coverage for you, the students. Yet we still put out quality publications for the students.

My experience with Student Publications and my leadership background help make me well qualified for this position.

Because I am copy editor for the Royal Purple, I know what Student Publications' needs are. I spend at least two hours a day in the office listening to the complaints, gossip and compliments.

I am also a Collegian reporter, so I am very familiar with the issues concerning the newspaper.

In addition to my experience inside Student Publications, I have held other leadership positions.

I believe that K-State is a good university making steps to become great. The Homecoming theme of "Making a K-Statement" sums it all up. From the improved football team to the National Champion debaters to award-winning Engineering designs, K-State is showing that it is not only one of the best universities in the Big Eight, but the nation.

However, things can be improved. Such programs as a shuttle service, expansion of the recreation complex and an improved Farrell Library can make the university an even better experience for all involved at K-State.

I would like to represent the College of Engineering in student senate to support such improvements as the one above. I will listen to new ideas from the people. And try to vote for the improvement of a good university. I would appreciate your vote in order to make your university a better place for you.

Elected and appointed public officials should exhibit consistent ethical behavior. The procedures and guidelines which are designed to give every student or student organization fair, even-handed treatment by student government should be followed. If the procedures or guidelines are unethical or inconsistent of student needs, they should be revised. Student Government is government for the students of K-State, and not a breeding ground for the already inflated egos of the few who always seem to give student government a bad name. A clear example is the furniture scandal a few weeks ago. As a student senator I will exhibit consistent ethical behavior and will be accountable for my actions. My actions and services will be for the benefit, not the detriment, of the student body.

As a student senator I will advocate innovative thinking to alleviate some of the most persistent and troubling problems confronting K-State students.

I feel that it's essential that the College of Agriculture get reasonable levels of funding from the Educational Opportunity Fund in order to maintain the high quality of competition teams that we currently have.

In addition, I also believe that K-State needs a minors program. We're the only Big Eight University without one, and this situation needs to be brought to the attention of Faculty Senate. I also believe there must be a solution to alleviate the parking situation on campus. This could be done through the use of a shuttle bus system, and I feel it could be paid for solely through user fees. I'm in favor of passage of the Farrell Library and the Rec Complex referendums as these additions will enhance K-State's image as a first-rate educational institution in the future.

Jeff Peterson

I feel the opportunity K-State students have to improve their campus with the expansion of the Rec Complex and expansion and renovation of Farrell Library is the biggest issue in this election. The academic minors program is another issue many students have shown concern about that has been dropped due to lack of funding.

I feel there will be an effort to reinstate the minor program along with a search for a new source of funding. I am running for Student Senate in the College of Agriculture. I have lived in a residence hall and am currently living off campus and am a member of a fraternity. I strive to be accessible to my constituents in the College of Agriculture.

Jordan may be problem in negotiations

Israeli, Jewish relations may stop deals, consultant says

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Those who are following the efforts to gain peace in the Middle East should step into a car and put on the safety belt—it's a guaranteed roller coaster ride.

That is what John Rothmann, political and foreign policy consultant, said Monday.

Rothmann's attempt to answer the question "Is there a prospect for real peace in the Middle East?" centered around the negotiations currently underway there.

Rothmann, who served on the staff of President Richard Nixon, said 17 percent of Israel's citizens are not Jewish.

"Just as Arabs live in Israel, Jews should be able to live in Arab states, if we expect real peace," Rothmann said.

These levels of conflict are between the superpowers, between Israel and the Arab states, and between Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization.

The conflict between the superpowers—the United States and the Soviet Union—doesn't, in reality, exist any more, he said, because the Soviet Union is no longer a superpower. But, he said, it is still a nuclear power, leaving the United States as the only superpower.

"The United States is the essential force that serves as a bridge between the Middle-Eastern powers," Rothmann said.

The second level of conflict is between Israel and the Arab states. The main players, he said, are Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

Rothmann said that although Egypt and Israel don't agree on many issues, there is still full communication between them. This will be an essential factor in the negotiations, he said.

Jordan, the second Arab country Rothmann discussed, will be a stumbling block in the negotiations. King Hussein of Jordan will have a hard time cutting a deal with Israel because 70 percent of its population is composed of Palestinians, who historically don't get along with the Israelis, he said.

Rothmann also talked about Syria, which is a country that no one trusts, he said. Syria sided with the United States during the Persian Gulf War, but Rothmann said it was only because their main enemy in the Middle East is Iraq.

With Iraq out of the way, Syria would have the chance to be the leading Arab power. Syria's main demand for the negotiations would be the return of the Golan Heights, which were taken in 1967.

The third level of conflict Rothmann said he sees in the negotiations is between Israel and the PLO, which has called for the destruction of Israel. Israeli leaders have said they want to stay out of this.

David Ovadia, graduate student in grain science, asked if the European Community could be seen as a superpower.

Rothmann said he saw their role in making peace a limited one. For one, they support the Arab states. He said Europe has a history of racism and used the Holocaust as one example. He also said Europe sold poisonous gas to Iraq before the gulf war.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin," and her sister. In 1968, the University and the collection received another substantial donation. Clementine Paddleford, former food editor of the New York Herald Tribune and This Week magazine, willed her personal library of more than 1,900 books to K-State.

Because of a small budget, the number and type of cookbooks purchased is limited, and the collection relies mostly on donations. Even so, Vander Velde said, the library has sought after certain books.

"We've definitely chased after the 'Joy of Cooking,'" he said, referring to the first-edition copy printed in 1931 that he was successful in obtaining for $950.

He said the collection has doubled in size in the 10 years he has been at K-State.

Vander Velde said he has never attempted to put a value on the collection, but he did say several of the individual books in the collection are worth thousands of dollars.

To preserve this valuable collection, the books are kept in a room where the temperature is kept between 70 and 72 degrees Fahrenheit, and the humidity is 50 percent.

Vander Velde said the collection is used most often by students and scholars interested in the historical and sociological aspects of foods, nutrition, cookery, household economy or the bibliographical features of the books themselves.

Vander Velde also said some students have used the collection to find out how to make different alcoholic drinks.

George Keiser, professor of English, uses the collection in connection with medieval bibliographies.

Along with a person's family, high school organizations and extracurricular activities are ways to discover and form personal leadership styles, Oleen said. Activities that happen outside the realm of high school are also beneficial.

"I think one of the underplayed areas, as far as leadership skill building is concerned, deals with volunteer efforts," Oleen said. "The volunteer pool in the United States in the past 20 years has decreased by 27 percent."

She said the lack of volunteers has created an inverted vacuum that opens the door for a variety of leadership skills to be needed.

Oleen stressed the importance of experiences of working with the public. She told a personal story about how involvement with Girl Scouts gave her the cooperation skills needed in a certain position.

"You never know what's going to really count and what people are looking for as part of your leadership skills."

Another way to fully utilize leadership skills is by being a good listener. Oleen said she has heard many times how a person learns absolutely nothing by talking, but only by listening. She said she has found this to be true as a teacher and as a senator.

Balance Classwork with Practical Experience

Although a lot of knowledge is obtained in the classroom, there is still a wealth of experience you can only obtain through a work environment.

Now is your chance to hone your skills by working on the sixth largest morning daily newspaper in Kansas—the Kansas State Collegian.

The Collegian is now accepting applications for the spring 1992 editor and advertising manager.

Editor in Chief

Supervises all areas of Collegian news planning, training, personnel and production. Delegates duties in the best interest of the publication. Assists with staff recruitment, training and retention programs. Serves as a liaison between the newspaper and its readership, the K-State community.

Advertising Manager

Supervises all areas of advertising planning, training, personnel and production. The advertising manager is responsible for conducting weekly staff meetings, planning special sections and supplements, logging and laying out ads. Should work well with people and be well organized. Previous staff experience preferred. Experience or coursework in advertising is expected.

Dear K-State Students,

Today and tomorrow we will be making important decisions about the future of Kansas State students. When I began this campaign many weeks ago, I started by making student's priorities my priorities. I want to continue to do that as student body president.

Please feel free to ask me any questions today or tomorrow on the north side of the Union as I am greeting students there.

I would appreciate your vote.

Numerous student internships available at Statehouse

Hands-on experience gained during school year with only 6 hours required

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

The Legislative Affairs Student Senate Committee is encouraging students to apply for internships at the Statehouse.

"It is good experience," said Barry Michie, assistant professor of political science. "For students that want hands-on experience on how the legislative process works, it is invaluable."

able."

William Richter, professor of political science, said it was his understanding that there are more internship openings than people who apply.

"I'm pretty confident that anyone that applies can get an internship," he said.

Some student senators are currently part of the internship program.

"Only six hours a week is required to do the internship," said Tricia

Thornton, arts and sciences senator and current intern at the Statehouse. "Student interns are provided parking permits, floor passes and are reimbursed for mileage from Manhattan to Topeka," she said.

There are two ways to apply for the internships.

One way is for the student to make contact with the state representative or senator in his or her own district.

Another is to go to the political science department and pick up an application.

Jolene Grabill, coordinator of the legislative intern program, said applicants should send in a brief type-written letter explaining reasons for wanting the internship, a completed copy of the application form, a current resume, a 1992 course schedule and times available to do the internship.

Thornton said, "There are about 80 spots open. Usually the legislators want law students, but there are enough internships to go around."

The interns jobs will include being a gopher, working on policies, going to meetings with legislators and answering letters from constituents.

To receive credit for the internship students must have two previous political science prerequisites - an American government course and one other political science course.

"The internship credit is a 700 level course," Richter said. "That's why we require a prerequisite. We feel that having some previous knowledge of political science will allow the intern to maximize the time he spends at the Capitol."

"Each student who does an internship will be assigned an advisor who will supervise their work," Richter said. "This advisor will also give the student certain requirements, usually a report or paper about what the student has done.

"There is no grade. The student will just receive credit," he said.

Students are matched with the legislators by Jolene Grabill, the legislative intern program coordinator, not the political science department, Richter said.

"The more K-State students that are at the Capitol on a regular basis, the more the legislators will be reminded to fund higher education, especially at K-State," Thornton said.

Leadership key to competing, changing

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Long-range thinking and seeing the big picture are two significant qualities needed to become successful leaders today, former Kansas Gov. John Carlin said Monday morning in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

LEADERSHIP WEEK

Carlin spoke about leadership in an internationally competitive world. Carlin's speech kicked off Leadership Week sponsored by Blue Key Honorary.

Darren Klish, senior in biochemistry and Blue Key, said the series of lectures was organized to enhance Leadership Week.

"This series of lectures was designed to expose leadership to students in an inspirational and motivational context," Klish said.

Carlin, a K-State alumnus, discussed leadership, the importance of open mindedness and the need for a willingness to change. He said competition is a factor, change is essential and leadership is the answer.

"It's not K-State vs. KU," Carlin said. "It's K-State vs. the world."

"One of the essential ingredients to understand in emphasizing the importance of leadership is to remember that there is incredible competition today, that is truly international," he said.

He said in order for people to be competitive, they have to be open, willing and successful at bringing about change.

Carlin discussed apathy, bureaucracy and politics as being obstacles to leadership. He said major obstacles are the cause of many people remaining uninvolved and in the long run causing leadership to deteriorate.

A problem the nation faces is new ideas aren't being shared or are being approached by mature standards, he said. New ideas must be nurtured like small children before they are released into the world as adults, he said.

"I truly believe that as an entity involved with leadership, that promoting and encouraging the discussion of leadership, can help it be a very positive contribution to the University," Carlin said.

Bus answer to parking problem

MIKE MARLETT/Collegian

Brittnay Ridge Estates and Park Place Apartments have cut costs by joining their busing services and charging the students for the service. Previously the service was free, but Brittnay Ridge residents now pay $10.00 per semester, and Park Place residents pay $37.50 per semester.

Apartment complexes join forces to offer transportation 10 times per day

DARLA GOODMAN
Staff Writer

Two apartment complexes have combined their bus services to residents to combat the campus parking problem.

Both Park Place Apartments and Brittnay Ridge Estates offered a bus service last year, but owners combined the services at the beginning of this semester for two primary reasons.

"It's cheaper to operate one bus than two, and we have a back-up bus available," said Joe Gabbard, contractor for the bus service.

"The close proximity of the two complexes to each other made it practical," he said. "We drove right by Park Place anyway."

Shelly Reeves, Park Place manager, said combining services was a benefit to the residents.

"We've got access to both buses," she said. "That way, if there's a problem with one, we still have the service."

Students can purchase a bus pass from their respective complex.

Brittnay Ridge charges residents $10 per semester for the service, and Park Place charges $37.50.

Bob Simpson of Dan Weir and Co., the developer of Brittnay Ridge, said the Brittnay Ridge price is lower because the cost of the service is subsidized by the Townhome Owners Association. In the future, he said, it may even out, depending on what the owners decide to do.

Park Place resident Jodi Cowan, senior in sociology, said she rode the bus last year but decided not to this year.

"They just charged way too much," she said. "It broke down several times last year, and I didn't want to take the chance of not being able to get to school."

Williams said it has worked out to have the back-up bus because the Park Place bus is being repaired right now, and the Brittnay Ridge bus had problems at the beginning of the semester.

The service can be a necessity to some students. Park Place resident Eric Gibson, graduate student in statistics, doesn't own a car.

"I think it's convenient for everyone whether you have a car or not," he said. "It beats trying to find a parking space."

Bus driver Buckie Williams makes 10 trips per day from the complexes to campus and eight trips back. He said about 115 people ride each day depending on class schedules and weather.

Brittnay Ridge resident John Newhouse, junior in civil engineering, said Williams tries to help residents out when possible. He even drops him off at his building sometimes, he said.

Park Place resident Jodi Dreiling, freshman in architecture, said Williams sometimes lets people off before the scheduled campus stop if it will put them closer to their classes.

"It works out well with my schedule, so it's pretty nice," she said.

Gibson also said the schedule works well, but he said it can be hard sometimes to make it to a class on the other side of campus from the drop-off spot at the K-State Union Plaza. The bus usually pulls in around 15 minutes after the hour, he said.

More people rode the bus Thursday and Friday, Williams said, because of the weather.

"All the paperwork is required by the federal government, so the things I could do to streamline the process are limited," he said. "One thing I could change is to upgrade the computer system they use to make it quicker."

Luis Perez, senior in political science, decided to run as a write-in candidate this past Friday evening and also spoke at several locations including Marlatt Hall.

"We've all heard the other candidates talk about campus safety, ethics, and the little things, but take a look around. How many people knew about this debate?" he said.

Perez was alluding to the fact that only 15 of the hall's residents showed up.

"Students are apathetic, and I'd like to see that change," he said. "I'd like to see more students get involved with student government."

Perez, if elected, said he would try to create a second Senate body comprised of students representing other aspects of campus life. The present Senate is composed of senators who represent their respective colleges.

"There are some issues I feel shouldn't go to a body with representatives by college. They need to go to another body," he said. "Campus lighting, a shuttle system, improving Farrell Library—college is immaterial for those issues."

Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics and presidential candidate, said her campaign focuses on the little problems with which students have to deal on an everyday basis.

"In the past, the emphasis has been on lobbying, on the big picture," she said. "They fail to see the little things on campus, like how Faculty Senate is discussing charging students $5 to drop and add classes."

McClaskey also said she wants all groups on campus to communicate with each other.

some other things that can help the team besides just shoot."

That label is not unfounded. Price canned nearly 50 percent of three-point attempts his second season at South Carolina en route to averaging 14.4 points per game. But Price also led the Gamecocks in assists and steals that season. Last year, he just missed becoming the fourth player in NCAA history to record 200 assists and 100 steals in a season.

While the shooter label may bother Price, any comparisons to his older brother no longer do. Price said he has come to terms with the inevitable comparisons and even calls himself "Mark's biggest fan." In fact, Brent returned to Oklahoma to follow in the footsteps of another Price—his father, Denny, starred for the Sooners in the late 1950s.

"That's been a stigma I've had to deal with ever since junior high and it's something I've just had to live with," Price said of comparisons to his brother. "I can see that as long as we're both playing it's something I'll have to deal with, so it doesn't affect me anymore."

Cincinnati won its first game. The Bengals beat the Cleveland Browns 23-21.

Matt Stover hit the left upright from 47 yards out with 1:55 left. Brian Brennan also had a Bernie Kosar pass hit him in the shoulder in the end zone. And Eric Thomas blocked Stover's 34-yard try as time expired.

The Pittsburgh Steelers blew two late chances in its 20-13 loss to the Denver Broncos. Gary Anderson missed from 24 yards and Neil O'Donnell's fourth-and-one pass in the last minute bounced off Eric Green on the goal line.

New England lost 22-17 at Buffalo. The Bills needed an interception by Darryl Talley at the 30 with 15 seconds left to end the Patriots' final threat.

The Indianapolis Colts (0-9) were in Sunday's game with the Miami Dolphins. After falling behind 10-0 in the first quarter, they got two field goals from Dean Biasucci. But Louis Oliver's interception killed one drive, then they reached the Miami 47 where Jeff George's fourth-down pass with 1:53 left fell incomplete.

DDT

The results mapped the location of metal objects under the ground's surface. Two areas of high intensity readings were mapped.

"One area turned out to be a culvert and the other area was the barrels," Matteson said. "When I talked to John this morning, they felt like they just didn't know how to read them (the maps), that's why it wasn't all removed the first time," he said.

Lambert said, "I have a call into the state. We won't know until they call me back what the next step is.

"After I tell him what's happened, he may have decided to approve it over the phone or he may say 'I need this in writing.'"

If the state decides the University must submit a proposal outlining it plans to remove these additional barrels, the removal time will be significantly delayed.

Before removing the first barrels, the public safety office submitted to the state a detailed outline of the removal plans. The state then decides to approve or reject the plan.

The first plan proposed by the University was rejected, but the second was approved.

"We had to tell the state what we were going to remove, what the people who would actually be doing the removal would wear and what type of training they would receive beforehand," Lambert said.

Polls packed for campus elections

On the first day of Student Government elections, approximately 2,700 students voted. The turnout numbers were more than half of last year's voters for both days of elections. Loring Cox, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, checks over his ballot Tuesday afternoon at the K-State Union. Students can still vote today in the Union.

Future of Farrell and Rec Complex add to heavy turnout for first day of voting Polling stations for Student Government elections were packed Tuesday, Senate election committee members said.

Tuesday was the first day for students to vote for student body president, senators for K-State's seven colleges and the Board of Student Publications. There were also referendum questions on the ballot regarding expansion of Farrell Library and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Students may also vote today.

For last year's Student Government elections, the total number of voters was approximately 4,700. This year's first day topped 2,700.

Ann Woodbury, junior in business administration and elections committee chairwoman, said the voting stations in both the K-State Union and College of Veterinary Medicine were very busy.

"I worked at Vet Med from 11:30 to 1:30, and 94 people voted between those times," she said. "That's considerably more than we've had in the past — total, let alone one day."

Woodbury said the number of voters increases whenever there is a referendum.

"I think the referenda have a lot to do with it. The issues were well-publicized, and the students are well-informed," she said.

Jeff Forkenbrock, senior in hotel and restaurant management and committee member, said the turnout was big, considering the bad weather. "I worked from 10 to 12, and it was busy," he said. "There were big rushes when classes got out, like at 10:20 and 11:20."

Woodbury said some seminar-type classes were brought over as a group to vote.

"People are paying more attention to student issues," she said.

Forkenbrock said there were no problems during the first day of elections other than a small number of students whose names were not on the voting list for some reason or another.

"If someone just changed majors to another college, they would be on the other list," he said. "Also, like a graduate student in agriculture would try to come vote at the agriculture table, but they would need to get their ballot from the graduate table."

Lora Gilliland, senior in radio-television and committee member, said there were some problems keeping campaign paraphernalia out of the voting area. A sign posted at the stairs in front of the Union Stateroom door notified people no campaign materials were allowed beyond that point.

"I would say, 'Hey, turn your sweatshirt inside out,' and people would think I was kidding," she said. "And I would ask people to take off the stickers that say, 'Vote yes for Farrell,' or at least zip up their coats."

Gilliland said some students tried to bring the Student Government section of Tuesday's Collegian into the area, ■ See ELECTION Page 12

SGA ELECTIONS

Tuesday's turnouts for Student Government Elections were high. Election officials say the two referendums on the the ballot probably brought more people out to vote.

Israeli army bans demonstrations by Palestinians

West Bank, Gaza Strip affected by new military ruling

By the Associated Press

Editor's note: This article was submitted to Israeli military censors, who ordered a deletion.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army announced Tuesday that Palestinian peace demonstrations in the occupied territories will not be permitted because they could escalate into violent confrontations.

"We are not allowing any demonstrations," Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Ehud Barak declared on a tour of the West Bank. "Many demonstrations starting with olive branches ... quickly become very violent."

Palestinians in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and the Gaza Strip have organized dozens of peace demonstrations since the Mideast peace talks opened last week in Madrid, Spain.

Participants have sometimes clashed with Israeli troops or members of Muslim fundamentalist and radical Palestinian groups opposing the talks.

In comments over army radio, Barak said commanders in the field have been instructed to use sound judgment and not necessarily employ force while dispersing nonviolent demonstrations.

On Tuesday, soldiers dispersed a demonstration by about 600 Arabs who were waving olive branches and chanting slogans in the West Bank town of Tulkarem. In theory, Palestinians would still be allowed to ask for a permit to demonstrate, but Barak said the chances of one being granted were slim.

The fundamentalist movement Hamas, or Zeal, issued another leaflet Tuesday vowing to kill Palestinian supporters of the peace talks with Israel.

"We warn away those bargaining away Palestine that he who will approve the confiscation of Palestine and Jerusalem will not pass without a punishment," the leaflets said.

The Palestinian negotiators are seeking limited autonomy as a first step toward self-rule in their talks with Israel, which captured the West Bank and Gaza, home to 1.7 million Palestinians, in the 1967 Six Day War.

The Palestinian uprising that began in 1987 has claimed more than a thousand lives.

The number of Palestinians killed by Israelis in the uprising rose to 867 with the death Tuesday of Mahdi Abu Hassan, a 22-year-old Arab armed with a submachine gun who tried to fire on troops who seized him, Israeli sources said.

At least 464 Palestinians have been slain by other Arabs as suspected collaborators with Israel, and 74 Israelis have died.

In south Lebanon, meanwhile, Israeli and allied militia gunners shelled suspected guerrilla bases of Shiite Muslim fundamentalists with 155mm howitzers near Israel's self-designated border security zone.

Storm causes drippy situation

Buildings leak; new roofs planned for several halls

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

K-State is still feeling the effects of last Thursday's ice storm.

Buildings across campus are experiencing leaks bad enough for some professors to pack it up and head for home. An especially hard-hit building is Denison Hall.

Some classrooms inside Denison have been left empty as maintenance crews work to stop the leaks. Ceiling tiles in these rooms had to be replaced after they fell to the floor.

George Keiser, professor of English, was forced to move out of his Denison office after water literally poured from the ceiling during Thursday's storm.

"This has been going on for five years. They (Facilities) come up and scrape at the roof a little bit and then go away," he said.

Keiser said Facilities has failed to correct the problem because they only concentrate on quick fixes. He said three years ago at Christmas he came in to find the corridor on the second floor filled with water.

"This is a problem of long standing that hasn't seemed to get any attention," he said.

The accumulation of melting snow on the flat roof has caused water to leak from the ceiling, said Ed Rice, assistant vice president of Facilities.

"The storm we had created a lot of problems, especially with the flat roofs," Rice said. "The snow piles up and drifts onto areas of the roof where it usually doesn't, and it leaks through."

Rice said Facilities has had crews up on the roofs to shovel off the snow.

Laura Moody, office assistant for the Department of English, said department personnel had to move everything out of some of the classrooms because of the water leaking onto the floors. Denison 124 had about six ceiling tiles fall as they were moving chairs out, she said.

"I walked by earlier and it sounded like someone was taking a shower because of all the water pouring in," Moody said.

Keiser said the ceiling in Denison

113, which is plaster instead of tile, was soaked last Friday. There was also a large wet area against a wall.

Offices throughout the building had furniture and equipment covered with plastic to keep the water from dripping onto the computers and books.

Rice said the roof on Denison will be replaced later this spring. He said the contract is out for bid right now. Until then, maintenance crews will be busy patching up any leaks they find, he said.

The average life of the roof on a campus building is 20 years, Rice said. The roof on Denison is 30 years old. Each year he said the Department of Facilities replaces three to four roofs.

"We're looking at a $100,000 roof for Denison and we'll be doing $290,000 in roofs this year," he said.

The funding for the new roofs comes from a special maintenance budget provided by the Legislature. Rice said while the Facilities budget for minor repairs has been cut heavily, the special maintenance budget hasn't been cut as of yet. He said the special budget is used only for the replacement of

Take precautions for a safe winter

Heat appliances, overplugging outlets cause threats

STEPHANIE WATSON
Collegian Reporter

Students gearing up for a cold winter may want to take some extra precautions to ensure it's a safe one as well. With the growing coldness, students often use electric or kerosene heaters for extra heat.

According to Marvin Rodriguez, marketing representative for KPL Gas Service, students should make sure the appliances they buy are Underwriter's Laboratory approved.

Rodriguez said students can do several things to ensure their safety while trying to keep warm.

"People should never overplug an outlet," Rodriguez said.

He said many appliances plugged into one outlet may be too much for it and could result in a blown fuse.

"Space heaters should only be run while someone is in the room, and they should also have a turn-off switch in case it tips over," Rodriguez said.

He said people should be especially careful with kerosene heaters. Since kerosene burns air in the house, carbon monoxide fumes can accumulate and possibly become dangerous.

"Kerosene heaters must be run with fresh air, so people should make sure a window or door is cracked," he said. "No paper products, cloths or flammable material should be around the heater."

Carbon monoxide is also the reason people should never burn charcoal briquettes for warmth, said Gene Meyer, extension specialist for K-State.

Gates confirmed as new CIA head

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Tuesday overwhelmingly confirmed Robert Gates as head of the Central Intelligence Agency following a six-month ordeal that laid bare painful disputes within the spy agency.

The vote was 64 to 31, a strong margin despite the taint of the Iran-Contra affair that clung to Gates through much of the confirmation hearings and charges that he tailored intelligence reports to suit the political views of Reagan administration higher-ups.

Backed by a solid phalanx of Republicans, Gates benefited from a split within Democratic ranks to survive the longest and most controversial approval process ever for a CIA nominee.

Confirmation also reversed the sharpest setback in the career of Gates, whose swift rise up the CIA ladder was stymied in 1987 when President Reagan named him to head the agency but he was forced to withdraw under the cloud of Iran-Contra.

President Bush said in a statement issued after the Senate's action that the "vote is a confirmation that Bob Gates has the professional expertise and experience to lead our intelligence community during these changing times."

Senate supporters campaigned for Gates on the ground that his background in intelligence work gave him the know-how to do the job and that he had overcome whatever past deficiencies he may have had.

"The last thing you want is someone at the helm of an agency who really does not have experience in that field," said Intelligence Committee Chairman David Boren, D-Okla., the most outspoken Gates booster in the Senate.

"If you're going to find someone who's never made a mistake, you've got to find someone who's never made a decision," Boren said.

But doubts lingered among many lawmakers. "I have an uneasy feeling about Mr. Gates, and I don't think we ought to have that uneasy feeling about whoever heads the CIA," said Sen. Paul Simon, D-Ill., who voted against confirmation.

"I think we can do better in this country. I think we can find someone who would have the unanimous support of this body," Simon said.

A sign on the office door of George Keiser, professor of English, explains his Denison Hall office is unusable because of the building's leaky roof.

Agronomy prof to head NACTA

Gerry Posler, head professor of the agronomy department, has been elected to serve as the president of the National Association of Colleges and Teachers of Agriculture.

NACTA is an organization designed to improve college teaching of agriculture at four-year and two-year colleges across the United States and Canada. There are about 1,000 members.

Posler, who has been teaching at K-State for 17 years, says he has been a member of NACTA since the late 1960s.

Posler's involvement with NACTA has included being a member of many different committees, the book review editor of the NACTA Journal, a term as the central regional director and being NACTA's vice-president last year.

Posler said his involvement got him elected.

"It's just a matter of being selected by your service and enthusiasm," he said.

"It usually works so that the vice-president works his way up, and so it's not very often that there's big floor fights."

mentally and physically handicapped and blind.

It wasn't known if the girl died from the .22-caliber gunshot wound or as a result of being struck by the vehicle, Sgt. Doug Morrill said. An autopsy was pending.

"We are handling it strictly as a murder-suicide," Morrill said. "There was no note, but over the past three months she had told family members that she was contemplating suicide and that she was going to take her daughter with her."

The woman's husband was asleep at their home in Garden Grove when she drove six miles to the freeway and stopped by the side of the road.

The car that hit them didn't stop, and the driver may not have known what the vehicle struck, Morrill said.

'Doonesbury' banned by newspaper

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A newspaper said Tuesday it won't publish a series of "Doonesbury" cartoon strips suggesting that federal drug officials suppressed information about Vice President Dan Quayle.

Other newspaper editors questioned the cartoons by Garry Trudeau.

A Quayle spokesman said he wasn't aware of any such file or probe.

"I'm one of the staunchest and earliest admirers of Garry Trudeau," said George B. Waters, president and publisher of the Daily Sentinel of Rome, N.Y. His paper decided not to run the two-week series scheduled to start next week.

"There are times when he goes over the edge in taste and possible libel," Waters said of Trudeau. "I don't want to carry out his personal vendettas."

Universal Press Syndicate in Kansas City distributes "Doonesbury" to nearly 1,400 publications.

Universal Press Editorial Director Lee Salem said the strips allege the Drug Enforcement Administration has a file on Quayle and the file's existence was covered up.

In the strip, fictional newspaper reporter Rick Redfern tracks down a tip on the unsubstantiated allegations.

WHY VOTE FOR THE LIBRARY REFERENDUM?

- | | |
|-------------------------|--|
| More Student Services | -guarantees a library student lounge with vending services, facilities for extended hours with security. |
| Now or Never | -if the referendum fails to pass, $5 million in alumni donations may be lost and matching State funding in this decade will be unlikely. |
| No Student Fee Increase | -existing student fees are not increased. Current fees are continued to support the purchase of $5 million in bonds in 1996 if student funds are matched by alumni and State funds. |
| Better Environment | -provides central air conditioning, sofa style seating, quiet study space, and 1,150 additional first-quality study spaces. |
| More Space | -adds 122,250 square feet to Farrell's existing 148,000 square feet. Provides shelf space for 900,000 new volumes. Nearly doubles current size of Farrell. |
| A Science Library | -establishes a central sciences/technology library. |

REFERENDUM

QUESTION & ANSWERS

Question: Why are both the Library and the Rec Complex on the same ballot?

Answer: Both are in need of expansion and renovation. Since both can be funded with NO INCREASE in costs to students, now is the time to vote to re-direct current bond monies to these projects. Both projects must be supported by the students as these are becoming a "now or never" situation.

Question: Will this cost the student more?

Answer: NO! These projects only re-direct current monies being collected and do not increase any fees. This is a very important point to understand--There will be NO INCREASE IN FEES TO DO THESE PROJECTS.

Question: When will these projects start?

Answer: The Rec Complex will start in the Fall of 1992 with completion expected late 1993 or early 1994. The Library fee accumulation begins in the Spring of 1994. Foundation and State contributions must be finalized by 1996 or the student commitment will end.

Question: Should either the Library or the Rec Complex fail, will the money go to the other's project?

Answer: No, not without an entire new referendum being established by Student Senate, with considerable time delays. The "best of both worlds" is now and students must vote yes for both to take advantage of all possibilities.

Question: Why should students pay part of the cost of the library expansion?

Answer: Expansion is critically needed and can not wait for the State to provide full funding. Most new Regents' University structures built in this century will require student/private/federal contributions.

Question: Why is the Rec Complex getting more money for its project than the Library?

Answer: The Library will also receive Foundation and State support. The student contribution is to help show student commitment and to help bring this project to the forefront. The Rec Complex has always been and will continue to be supported by student fees only.

Question: What is needed to pass this referendum?

Answer: Of those students voting, 60% must vote in favor of the project to make it pass.

WHY VOTE FOR THE REC COMPLEX REFERENDUM?

REC COMPLEX

- A MUCH LARGER WEIGHT/FITNESS ROOM--Almost three times larger than current room with area for free weights, machines, a circuit area, and cardiovascular machines.
- AN AEROBIC/MULTI-ACTIVITY ROOM--About the size of two basketball courts for aerobic sessions. Special floor, improved sound system and acoustics.
- FOUR MORE BASKETBALL COURTS
- A LONGER ELEVATED TRACK
- CONVERT CURRENT WEIGHT ROOM TO A TABLE TENNIS ROOM
- AIR CONDITION ENTIRE BUILDING
- RENOVATE SOME AREAS includes re-surfacing gym and racquetball court floors

OUTDOORS

- RE-SURFACE TENNIS COURTS AND UPGRADE LIGHTS
- LIGHT PLAYFIELDS to include four softball fields for night play
- INSTALL UNDERGROUND IRRIGATION FOR PLAYFIELDS

WHERE DOES THE MONEY COME FROM?

This will be accomplished WITHOUT ANY INCREASE IN FEES TO THE STUDENTS. Current monies would be re-directed to this expansion.

TIME OF COMPLETION?

After a successful vote, the State would hire an architect with construction to begin in the fall of 1992. Completion of the additional facilities and opening would be late 1993 or early 1994.

Secretary of state learns at Chiefs game, Rod Stewart concert

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

After attending the Chiefs vs. Raiders Monday Night Football game, last week's Rod Stewart concert in Kansas City and the two most recent Landon Lectures, Kansas Secretary of State Bill Graves said he realized something about what people want to see from government.

"It occurred to me that the government is not flashy, exciting or entertaining enough," he said.

"Most people don't know the

name of the lieutenant governor, but 12,000 people in Kemper Arena sang along, for two-and-a-half hours, every word to every song by Rod Stewart," he said.

Graves also said there were about 1,500 people in attendance for each Landon Lecture, but 78,000 for the Chiefs game.

Graves' speech, "Leadership at the State and National Levels," was one of 12 lectures scheduled this week as part of Blue Key Leadership Week.

Graves used a doctor-patient analogy to illustrate what he thinks is the public's opinion about leadership in American government.

"I'm the doctor, and the patient is government leadership. I've taken a look at the symptoms: overweight, out-of-shape, lethargic, not interesting, not responsive, has ulcers due to debt concerns and black eyes because it has been beating itself around the head and shoulders area," he said. "The problem is it doesn't know how to take care of itself."

Graves said government bashing is popular now both by the public and those involved in government.

"People in the business tell us what's wrong but not what to do to correct it," he said.

Graves offered four ways to help improve leadership in government.

"First, we need to refocus the debate on policy issues," he said.

His second suggestion was to find ways for citizens to get a stronger voice in forming public policy.

"We need to break up long-time coalitions and get new groups involved," he said.

Graves also said it's important to have more places where people can get together and discuss policies.

"Candidates are asked questions on where they stand on an issue, and they have been fairly successful at ducking those," he said. "In the state of Minnesota, they have something called Citizen Juries. It opened up the process there."

The Citizen Jury system begins when the League of Women Voters selects a dozen people from diverse backgrounds. The group then meets several times prior to the gubernatorial election.

"They interview the gubernatorial candidates — not just for an hour or something but all day," he said. "They talk to them and answer questions of the jury. Then, the verdict, or results, are published."

Graves said this publication provides something to which the public can relate and that it is a system which could be implemented in Kansas.

Getting the media to focus more on the public dimension of governmental candidates is the toughest, he said.

"We need to encourage the candidates to talk about themselves rather than what their opponent has done wrong," he said. "Tell the candidates to clean up their act, and citizens need to demand for them to clean up their act."

"That will send a signal to the media that what's important is the positive aspects as opposed to the negative."

Graves is currently serving his second term as secretary of state.

He is the chief elections official for the state, and his office oversees a variety of business-related filing and tax requests.

High-dollar renovation

Dan Davis, Olsburg, shovels snow from the walkway of the Independent Order of Oddfellows building Tuesday afternoon. The building is one of three being renovated as part of the $10 million Flint Hills Job Corps Center, located west of Manhattan near the Manhattan Airport. The main contractor for the project, Ferrell Construction, Topeka, also constructed four new buildings. The center will open early next year.

Out-of-state trash no longer bringing in money

By the Associated Press

McPHERSON — The owners of a landfill that has been criticized for accepting out-of-state trash are no longer making money from it and want to get rid of it, their attorney said Tuesday.

Resource Management Inc., which bought the McPherson city landfill from a private contractor last March, is not bringing in any trash for the moment, attorney Robert Jones of Salina said.

At the same time, he said, the company is facing a private lawsuit, a $12,000 fine over a fire in September and an order from the state to close and begin cleaning up polluted groundwater.

As a result, the company has gone broke and cannot afford its installment payments to the seller nor the heavy costs of a shutting down for good, Jones said.

No Kansas trash goes into the landfill, which the owners bought with out-of-state clients in mind. Its last client was a New York company which, fearing it could be implicated in a suit over pollution, found another place to dump its trash, Jones said.

"They are unable to continue to operate the facility because they cannot pay their bills," Jones said. "The costs they have had to incur in order to deal with all the activities by the State of Kansas and the litigation that has ensued has just basically caused them to be unable to meet their day-to-day operational needs."

Resource Management Inc. is a

Kansas holding company owned by John Decina and Gary Feldman of Brick Town, N.J.

They are now studying ways to get rid of the landfill, according to Jones. He said he did not know what other assets they might have in New Jersey nor whether they were considering putting Resource Management Inc. into bankruptcy.

One option is for Decina and Feldman to give their stock in the landfill back to the previous owner, Joe Engravalle of McPherson, Jones said.

Threat of cuts still on minds of many

Two hundred students and faculty gathered in front of Seaton Hall Tuesday to continue what 2,000 people started Oct. 31, 1990.

The protests and rallies of a year ago brought an end to President Jon Wefald's plan of reorganization, which included the closure of the colleges of Architecture and Design and Human Ecology.

We hope.

The participants of Tuesday's rally gathered to ensure such drastic planning will not happen again. And, they obviously realized, if people don't remember the past, they run the risk of repeating its mistakes.

Our University would have been no better than a trade school if two of our largest colleges were dissolved. We would have lost the heart of being a university.

The one-year mark shows that students and faculty are willing to work with the administration to reach a better alternative than the one proposed by reorganization. And it shows the need to remember so we don't forget what could have happened.

We thank the participants of Tuesday's rally for following through with their protests against reorganization. Their simple vigil on a cold, damp day lacked the architecture students' drama of T-square graves on Wefald's lawn, but it lacked none of the passion.

Suicide Machine questions rights, laws

Jack Kevorkian may once again be charged with murder.

He didn't pull a trigger or tighten a rope. He built a machine that makes it possible for terminally ill patients to commit suicide.

The machine is wrong, but looking at Kevorkian as an evil, money-grubbing mad scientist is wrong as well.

The issue of euthanasia or suicide is as difficult and as hot a topic as the death penalty and, more recently, abortion have become.

They all pit personal human rights against preserving human life. It's not hard to tell why there is such a large gray area and so many fired-up people.

Whether Kevorkian is right or wrong can be looked at two ways.

In ideals and absolutes, those who support the right to die with dignity will say he is absolutely right, while those who support the preciousness of life — no matter the quality — and who cannot condone euthanasia or suicide in any form will say he is absolutely wrong.

But in practical terms, either he is capitalizing on death, which is sick and selfish, or, more likely, he has simply seen one too many terminally ill patients suffer in a way no person should ever have to suffer.

He felt helpless. Building this suicide machine made that feeling of helplessness subside a little.

People should not be too quick to judge, because being terminally ill or having to watch someone die a slow, passive and painful death may change a person's mind about the right to die.

The machine is wrong — not because of these absolutes, but because it may lead to greater evils.

When suicide or euthanasia is determined to be OK in one instance, it makes it harder to justify why it is not OK in another. And the floodgates have opened.

Don't be a spectator to the CARNIVAL of LIFE

Symbols help to understand, but fail to solve problems

ERIC BECKER

A long time ago a writer named Eric Becker wrote a column in which he suggested that life was a movie.

You don't need to remember, or even have seen, the column to get the gist. Becker suggested that his life, (and that life in general, probably), seemed to be a series of unrelated episodes. An individual, Becker asserted, was the main character of his or her own movie in which he was never allowed to see more than a single page at a time.

It was only a metaphor and one which may not have been very original (except in its representation), at that. Didn't Shakespeare write that the world was a stage and all its people players?

There are other metaphors, too.

A now-disbanded rock group called The Band used to sing a song called "Life is a Carnival": "The street is a sideshow from the peddler to the corner drug ..."

Federico Fellini, the film director, made movies containing a similar sentiment. Many of Fellini's movies made use of a circus metaphor comparing life to the colorful, staged and acrobatic performance of a circus.

These, too, are only metaphors. In its attempts to explain the unexplainable, our art often resorts to such speculative devices — devices which certainly have a beauty, a value, not least of all because they do help us to cope if not understand.

But a metaphor as a symbol for life is only worth what one invests in it. Once invested, of course, it can mean a lot. But, like money, it has no value outside of the system that creates it. You can't eat a symbol. And there are probably people who have symbols who can't afford to eat.

It's a crazy world, for sure. Somebody ought to sell tickets. Probably make a fortune at it.

But that fortune would be worth nothing outside of the world of fortunes that would acknowledge and respect it.

In a world where people are starving to death on Main Street, where people are being murdered in acts of "random" violence (as the unfortunate but remarkable events of the last two weeks will testify), and where emotions can be manipulated and twisted on a daily basis with less effort than it takes to squeeze a grapefruit, one must be cautious in giving his or her symbols too much power.

There's a real world out there. To dismiss it as a movie or carnival doesn't solve the challenges that we face. It simply doesn't do.

Metaphors, works of art, are defensible for their beauty (when they're beautiful). But it's important that we don't stop the game once it's been described.

Events cast shadows before them. It's not voodoo. Foreshadowing is not only a device of literature. Sometimes lines divide us, but they also connect us to our past and present and, ultimately, to our future as well.

Our job is to find those lines to see where they've come from and discover where they're leading us. We cannot afford to accept the script a page at a time. We must assume some of its authorship and use it to make a difference when we can.

That's the thing that Eric Becker is discovering. It's the thing that he wanted to share.

YES - for both

Defeating Rec won't benefit Farrell

KERRY DELAY GUEST

Editor's note: Kerry Delay is a senior in electrical engineering.

Today students have the opportunity to improve the standard of living and learning at K-State. A window of opportunity exists now that will not present itself again.

Unfortunately, the success of the two projects of which I am speaking may be hindered simply due to the spread of misinformation. I am referring to both John Ryan's Nov. 4 guest column and to comments I have heard in everyday conversation.

I appreciate John's concern for the Farrell Library. I, too, have spent many frustrating hours in Farrell either looking for a phantom scientific volume or just looking for a comfortable place to study. For this reason, I have been working with other students to publicize the referendum now upon us.

I also know the facts, however, concerning the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. It is very crowded in the early morning and evening hours. More space is needed as usage of the Rec Complex continues to increase.

For example, 383,883 users went through the turnstile at the Rec Complex during the 1988-89 school year. During the 1989-90 school year, that number increased to 407,605. During 1990-91, 437,165 users utilized the Rec Complex.

It is obvious that more and more students, faculty and alumni are becoming fitness conscious. The opportunity to exercise at their convenience is certainly important to many at this University. As of Oct. 31, 113,725 people had used the Rec Complex. This is 7,691 more than last year at the same time, and last year was a record-setting year.

In addition to more space for free weights, machines and cardiovascular machines, there are other needs apparent at the Rec Complex. The gyms and racquetball court floors are in desperate need of replacement. The outdoor tennis courts are also in poor shape, and these are used by our varsity tennis teams.

OK. Enough about what is needed at the Rec Complex. I would like to clear up a few misconceptions directly regarding the referendum in front of all students.

If John had done a little research, he would be aware of the bill Student Senate passed authorizing the referendum. In this bill, it is clearly stated where the existing student fees will be directed upon passage of the referendum.

Student fees will be redistributed to finance a $7.9-million expansion of the Rec Complex and a $5-million student contribution to the Farrell expansion. If one project is defeated, the other project will in no way profit. The dollar values to be directed to each project are clearly stated and set.

Therefore, John's suggestion that Farrell could be completed sooner if the Rec Complex is defeated is entirely false.

Farrell has reached a state of crisis. We now have an opportunity to improve the condition of this important campus facility. The Rec Complex is also in need of attention, and we can improve the condition of it also. The Rec Complex has been, and will continue to be, completely supported by student fees.

We must, therefore, continue our commitment to the Rec Complex so it does not reach the crisis condition we now have to battle at Farrell.

The time to make a positive impact on K-State is now. I won't be here to reap the benefits of what this referendum can provide and neither will many other students. But students in years past enabled us to enjoy many of the facilities we have now — the K-State Union, Bramlage Coliseum and Memorial Stadium to name a few.

I agree with John's statement that K-State prides itself on its education and what the University has to offer students.

As he said, "We must be willing to do what it takes to encourage excellence."

So, when you vote today, seize the opportunity that exists and vote "yes" for both the Rec Complex and Farrell. Vote "yes" for a better K-State.

SGA candidate improperly listed

Editor,

I would like to draw attention to the fact that some of the information printed about me in yesterday's section on the Business Senate candidates was incorrect.

First, my name is Jim, not Tim. Secondly, I live in a residence hall, not a fraternity. Finally, I am a junior, not a freshman.

In the future, I would like to see the candidates given a chance to make sure that the information printed about them is correct. It is not fair to run the information on the day of the election, because the candidates have no real recourse if something is wrong — many of the voters have already read the information and voted.

Finally, I would like to thank everyone who voted for me this year, and I hope I get the opportunity to represent you this coming semester.

Library funding possibilities exciting

Editor,

I would like to comment on John Ryan's column on the Chester E. Peters Recreation/Farrell Library situation. Now, if I get all these figures straight, the Rec Complex has $7.8 million in bond money coming loose. Also, there is $5 million coming loose from another bond being paid off — all this from our fees we are already paying.

Plus, $2 million to be donated if we, the students, come up with some money. Let's see, that would be $14.9 million for Farrell, with the proposed cost of expansion at $27 million. This is more than half the cost of construction.

Hey, this is serious money. So, let's get the ball rolling on the Farrell expansion, and if we need to expand the Rec Complex, I wouldn't mind having my fees raised a couple bucks to get that done either.

'My Three Sons' Fred MacMurray dies at age 83

Pipe-smoking dad remembered as big influence, humble

By the Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Fred MacMurray, who played the wise, pipe-smoking father on television's "My Three Sons" and starred in dozens of films, including "The Absent-Minded Professor," died Tuesday of pneumonia. He was 83.

MacMurray died at St. John's Hospital and Health Center in Santa Monica, said Sarah O'Meara, a family friend. He was admitted to the hospital Monday afternoon, she said.

MacMurray's stage, film and television career spanned more than 50 years and included more than 80 movies. He made films at a hectic pace, generally playing a genial, persistent leading man opposite most of the leading actresses of the day.

His best-known credits include family-theme comedies such as "Son of Flubber," "The Shaggy Dog" and "The Happiest Millionaire."

He is perhaps best known for his role as Steve Douglas, an aerodynamics engineer trying to raise his children in "My Three Sons." The show ran from 1960 to 1972, second only to "Ozzie and Harriet" as network television's longest-running situation comedy. The show is still popular in syndication.

Barry Livingston, now 37, played son Ernie Douglas on "My Three Sons." His real-life brother, Stanley, played his television brother, Chip.

"He was a big influence in my life as a child," Livingston said. "He was a pretty commanding figure on the set. He took a very paternal interest in me on the set and my brother."

"He would always defer to his boys as the success behind his show. He was always a very humble man."

While he was working on "My Three Sons," Walt Disney persuaded him to make a series of movies for his studio.

Disney once said of MacMurray, "He has a way of handling comedy that nobody else can compare with."

On his 80th birthday, MacMurray told the Associated Press, "I was asked the other day how I'd like to be remembered: fondly."

"Looking back over the years, which they say is a privilege afforded us octogenarians, I have some wonderful memories and people have asked me, 'Why don't you write a book like everyone else is doing?' I have trouble remembering the names of guys I played golf with last week."

Billionaire publisher found dead

Robert Maxwell's flamboyant life ends in waters off the Canary Islands

By the Associated Press

TENERIFE, Canary Islands — Robert Maxwell, the flamboyant billionaire who built a global publishing empire, was found dead Tuesday in waters off the Canary Islands. He reportedly fell from his 180-foot luxury yacht.

The death of the 68-year-old publisher ended the reign of a contentious press baron who battled unions, barked out orders in eight languages and bullied editors as he built a $2-billion media conglomerate.

In the last chapter of his career, he was accused by an investigative journalist of having close links with the Israeli secret service Mossad, a charge he heatedly denied.

The Czechoslovak-born Maxwell, who escaped the Holocaust and immigrated to Britain in 1940, personally ran his publishing empire, often making minute-to-minute decisions. His death raised questions about the future of his debt-burdened holdings, which include New York's Daily News.

Maxwell's sons took over running the businesses Tuesday.

"He was larger than life," said British Conservative Party lawmaker Anthony Beaumont-Dark. "He was the Citizen Kane of his time. If you wrote a film about his life, it would be rejected as unrealistic."

Maxwell's body was found 20 miles northwest of Grand Canary Island after an extensive air-and-sea search, said Fernando Cano, spokesman at the Spanish rescue center in Madrid.

It was taken by helicopter to the Gando air base on Grand Canary and from there to a morgue in the town of Las Palmas, where Maxwell's wife, Elizabeth, and their son, Phillip, identified the body.

Spanish national radio said the body was unclothed and showed no sign of violence. It said an autopsy would be conducted Wednesday.

British Prime Minister John Major called Maxwell "a great character who will be missed."

"Maxwell was a passionate friend of Israel, and we are sorry about this heavy tragedy," Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said. "God bless his memory."

Campbell Livingstone, the British vice-consul in the Canary Islands, said Maxwell's wife and son were somber but calm. He said he heard Mrs.

Maxwell say "something to the effect that her husband was a colossus in life and a colossus in death."

Javier Herce of the Spanish merchant marine, citing police, said captain Gus Rankin reported Maxwell was last seen by the crew at 4:45 a.m. (11:45 p.m. EST) and didn't answer a knock on his cabin door at 9 a.m.

At 12:45 p.m., after Maxwell failed to answer a business call and the crew discovered he was not on board, Rankin radioed a distress call, Cano said. Six hours later, the body was found.

The 180-foot yacht Lady Ghislaine had been sailing from Santa Cruz de Tenerife to Grand Canary, said Cano, and it later berthed at Los Cristianos on the southwestern coast of Tenerife island, which is west of Grand Canary.

In London, Charles Wilson, director of Maxwell's Mirror Group Newspapers, said there had been no suggestion of foul play. "We can only assume that Mr. Maxwell slipped and fell overboard," he said.

Weather officials said the skies were

Tie this red ribbon to the left door handle, outside rear view mirror, or antenna of your car as a sign that you join Mothers Against Drunk Driving in our wish for a happy and safe holiday season.

Join in celebrating the holidays in a different way. Taking a cue from the "Tie A Yellow Ribbon Around The Old Oak Tree," this red ribbon will serve as a reminder not to drink and drive during the holiday season. Don't be afraid to show you care.

This may be a difficult position to take. But if we don't care enough to stand up to our friends who wrongly insist they are sober enough to drive - we take an even greater risk. We risk losing a friend. We risk the lives of others, and we risk living with the knowledge that we might have prevented a tragedy from occurring.

Help us make a difference - "Tie a red ribbon on - for love and hope and safety this holiday time."

"After a combined 37 years in higher education, we appreciate the importance of private support. Private gifts are especially critical at Kansas State University, which consistently is at the bottom in funding of the regents' peer institutions. The recent publication and nationwide distribution of our textbooks, Principles of Macroeconomics and Principles of Microeconomics, has given us the opportunity to become active participants in fund raising at Kansas State University."

"The Essential Edge Campaign allows participants tremendous latitude when selecting the program or programs to support. Our careers have revolved around the study and teaching of economics, and we determined that our Essential Edge gift should benefit that academic program."

"We are donating the bulk of our royalties from sales of the textbooks at Kansas State University to the Department of Economics. Our contribution exceeded $3,800 during 1990."

TODD FERTIG

Centers
a rare breed

A comparison of preseason all-Big Eight teams from last season to this season shows just how different things will be in 1991-92.

Last year, both AP and UPI came up with an all-conference squad that ignored the necessity of guard play and captured the nature of the conference on paper.

The all-Big Eight team honored not just one or two, or even three or four centers. Five centers made up the postseason all-conference team. I guess if they played half-court or threw alley-oop passes on every play, this could be a pretty good team. But what the all-conference nominations did was show just how dominant big men have become.

The Big Eight, however, will take on an entirely different look this season. Gone are Doug Smith, Mark Randall, Shaun Vandiver, Victor Alexander and Rich King. Byron Houston of Oklahoma State is the only established big man who returns to the conference for the 1991-92 season.

The presence of these big men did more than just affect play around the hoop. Offenses constructed around widebodies like Vandiver and Alexander walked the ball up the floor and pounded it into the low post. Perimeter players bombed away from 3-point arc trying to stretch zones to allow easier entry passes.

This season, however, hardly a single true center can be found who might leave his mark on the conference. A look around the conference shows just what a difference a year makes.

Maybe the best big man in the nation last year, Smith didn't clog Missouri's running game, as others had a tendency to do. He will be sorely missed by the Tigers, who will look primarily to 6-10 junior Chris Heller to take over the position.

Heller did produce 9.5 points and almost six rebounds over the eight games he started in last year. More importantly, the Tigers were 7-1 in that stretch. If he can provide equally solid play in the post this season, he will emerge as one of the conference's top big men.

Houston loses his 7-foot sidekick Johnny Pitman, whose free-throw shooting was the laughingstock of the Big Eight, but he provided devastating muscle and a rebounding mentality. Houston can dominate at center, though he is more like 6-5 than 6-7, as the scales say in Stillwater.

Houston, however, places Cowboy coach Eddie Sutton in a difficult situation. The Cowboys need Houston in the paint, but Sutton feels an obligation to play him on the perimeter to help prepare him for an NBA career. Often compared to Charles Barkley, Houston has developed his ball handling and outside shooting in the past year and looks more deadly than ever. But away from the basket, Houston leaves a huge hole that other teams will exploit.

Rather than play two inexperienced newcomers in the post, Sutton will almost certainly opt to turn his four talented senior guards and Houston loose to run opponents to death. The fact that the most talented team in the Big Eight may have to play five players under 6-6 should give hope to the rest of the conference.

One team that could oust the Cowboys from the top spot because of big men is KU. Though the Hawks lost the services of Randall and Mike Maddox after last season, KU is accustomed to playing without a true center. If either of two newcomers — 7-1 freshman Greg Ostertag or 6-10 juco transfer Eric Pauley — proves capable, the height of the Jayhawks could propel them to the top of the conference.

The conference's top returning big man is Oklahoma sophomore Bryan Salier, whom Coach Billy Tubbs called one of the most unappreciated players in the Life goes on.

After suffering elimination from the postseason Big Eight Tournament with a loss to Iowa State, one would expect a lack of motivation from K-State in its remaining matches.

That's not the case when the opponent comes from down the river.

K-State will host KU at 7:30 tonight in Ahearn Field House, trying to improve its season record of 10-16 and 1-8 in Big Eight play.

Unlike the Wildcats, KU is still in the race for one of the four spots in the postseason tournament. KU comes to Manhattan with an impressive overall record of 21-6, but the team has five losses in conference play.

The Cats lost to KU in their first meeting in a tight five-set match, a fact that should give K-State added incentive tonight. But K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer keeps the excitement to a minimum.

"We have a season to finish, and our season isn't over because we're not going to the Big Eight Tournament," Hagemeyer said. "The KU match is just another game for our team. You can't get into a real excitement playing one team and not get the same intensity and excitement for other opponents."

For players who have been around longer than their coach, the KU game assumes a new meaning.

"The preparation isn't different from other games, but we want a win a little more just because of playing KU," junior Kathy Saxton said. "In that match, there's a little more rivalry between us and KU, and we liked to beat them."

"For me, the KU game is more special," senior Rhonda Hughes said. "We always want to beat KU more than any other team. It gives us a lot more desire to beat them."

What one more win would have meant to the K-State football program.

If the Wildcats win their remaining three games this season, their final record would be 7-4. It would be the fifth time the football team has reached the seven-win plateau. The other four times occurred in 1954 (7-3), 1934 (7-2-1), 1931 (8-2) and 1909 (7-2).

"This would mean a lot to the program," said sophomore safety Jaime Mendez. "But still it would hurt not to go to a bowl game."

What? Going 7-4 and not going to a bowl game? Maybe a return trip to Shreveport, La., for the Independence Bowl? Maybe is no longer possible. That's right.

Now, the NCAA is saying that a Division I school must have six wins against Division I opponents. This means the Cats will not even have a chance to make a possible return trip to Shreveport, La., the site of the first and only K-State bowl game.

K-State started the season 4-1 and people thought the team was on its way to a bowl game. But that good start included a 1-1 mark against Division I opponents.

The Cats just finished one of most emotionally draining periods of football ever known in these parts. With the losses to the Big Three — Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma — K-State lost its chance to receive a bid to a bowl game.

"When you play three games like we did during the past month, of course it's going to take an edge off of you," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "We were a little flat last week, but we'll have things turned around for this week."

Snyder is not concerned about the rule change requiring Division I programs to have six wins against Division I programs.

"We're not worried about that right now," he said. "What we have to concern ourselves with is Iowa State this weekend."

"We'll worry about bowl games when the season is over. We don't need any distractions."

Snyder said the rule, which was put into effect this fall, was a fine rule and that he had no problem with it.

Even Mendez sided with Snyder, but he added, "if other teams get in with six wins, it would hurt quite a bit."

"We could end up 7-4 and know that we got a lot accomplished during the season," Mendez said. "But if Kansas wins the rest of theirs, which is possible, they'll have their six wins and go. And that would hurt more than anything."

What KU needs to do is not going to be easy.

This weekend, KU plays host to Nebraska, then travels to Colorado and ends its season with Missouri.

"They've got two tough teams back-to-back," Mendez said. "If they can beat one of the two big teams, which they have a chance to do, they should be able to get a bid just from that."

"But, I'm hoping they don't just because I go to school here."

Mendez said the importance of the remaining games on K-State's schedule could provide a shot in the arm for the future.

Walden boring to fans

By the Associated Press

AMES, Iowa — To his critics who think he's becoming too predictable, Iowa State coach Jim Walden offers this: you ain't seen nothing yet.

The Cyclones have a quarterback whose strength is running, and Walden says that's exactly what they're going to do in Saturday's home game with K-State.

"Here's the way we're going to do it this week," Walden said Tuesday. "We're going to run to the right and run to the left and then we're going to run to the right again."

"Then if we really catch 'em napping, we'll run to the left, run to the right and then run back to the left again."

In other words, Walden said, "It's run to the left, run to the right, run to the middle and fight, fight, fight."

A letter in this week's Des Moines Sunday Register complained that Iowa State's offense lacked diversity and was becoming too predictable.

But Walden said he's merely running an offense that suits his quarterback, redshirt freshman Kevin Caldwell, who was thrown into the starting job because injuries have sidelined the Cyclones' top two quarterbacks.

"Our job as coaches is to do everything we can to provide our players an opportunity to win," Walden said. "If it bothers our fans that we're not throwing the ball, then I'm afraid they'll have to understand."

"I care more about my players' opportunity to win than I do about whether I'm predictable or not."

Caldwell threw only five passes and completed only one in Saturday's 23-22 victory over Missouri. But the Cyclones rushed for 299 yards, including 154 by Caldwell.

Walden said it was the fewest "Sometimes on third-and-seven, we're going to run a dive and make two yards, so get prepared," Walden said.

Golfers 8th

Although the rewards were few, the K-State men's golf team completed its best tournament of the fall at the Texas International Golf Championship in Fort Worth, Texas.

The Wildcats played another good round Tuesday, finishing with a four-man total of 303 for a two-round total of 600.

But that wasn't enough to hold on to seventh place, a position K-State took into the final day. The Cats settled for eighth place at the 14-team tournament.

"We're getting better," Coach Mark Elliott said. "But we still need some people to step up and play as consistently as Richard (Laing)."

Laing placed 11th at the tournament, posting a 72 on Tuesday after an opening-round 72.

"He played his normal, solid tournament," Elliott said of his junior standout. "He has been that way for us all year."

Brett Waldman, a true freshman, also received praise from his coach. He posted an impressive two-day total of 151.

"He played very well," Elliott said. "That's not bad for a freshman."

It was at least good enough to place him 26th out of 73 players.

K-State shot a 297 in Monday's opening round of the tournament. That ranked as the team's second-best round of the season.

The Cats came close to duplicating that performance in the final round. Although they were unable to maintain that pace up until the end, the 303 score ranked third among rounds this season.

Bill Graham, a senior, also was among the top half of finishers, placing 30th on the strength of a solid first round. Graham shot rounds of 74 and 78.

"Bill had poor starts on both the front and back sides today," Elliott said. "But he hung in there and finished strong."

Sophomore Will Siebert is another player who struggled. Like Graham, he held his game together and saved his score from disaster. He placed 44th at 154.

The K-State women's tennis team heads into the final tournament of the fall season with a chance to improve on the future. Play at the Rolex Regional Championships starts at 9 a.m. today in Omaha, Neb.

"This tournament will give us an opportunity to see a lot of the top players in our region," K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said. "It would be nice to finish the fall season on an upswing and have it carry over to next spring."

Bietau said several of the players will be playing for the first time in several weeks, which could be a problem.

"Other than the players who made the trip to California, some of our players haven't played in about a month," Bietau said. "The practices have been going well, but we need to do some playing."

One player Bietau said he believes will perform well again is freshman Karin Lusnic. Two weeks ago, Lusnic qualified for the main draw of the Riviera All-American Tennis Championships. She was the first K-State player to accomplish that feat.

"We're hoping she'll continue where she left off," Bietau said. "But we're hoping everybody can have a good tournament. This tournament will give us a good idea as to how much we've improved during the fall season."

In the singles competition, K-State has three players seeded in the top 20.

Karin Lusnic was ranked No. 3, followed by Michele Riniker at No. 11 and Mareke Plocher at No. 14.

In singles competition, Suzanne Sim will open with Alex Cappel of Northern Arizona. Lusnic will play Casey Cooley of KU, Sarah Brooks will play 13th-seeded Lisa Salvatierra of Utah.

Doran promoted by Yow

K-State women's assistant basketball coach Sue Doran has been named associate head coach by athletic director Milt Richards and head coach Susan Yow.

Doran is in her second season with the Lady Cat program and has been an assistant under Yow since 1980. Prior to coming to K-State, the duo served four seasons at Drake and seven at East Tennessee State.

"Sue Doran is very valuable to women's basketball at Kansas State," Richards said. "This promotion recognizes her contributions to Coach Yow and the entire program."

Latin America topic of lectures

Key to democracy is lack of intervention Stansifer says

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

The key to democratizing Latin America is the United States not interfering in the countries' politics, Professor Charles Stansifer said in a speech to about 80 people Tuesday as part of the Latin American Awareness Lecture Series.

"I think it is a natural thing for students of the Spanish language to have an innate interest in the culture that language represents," said Bradley Shaw, head of the modern languages department, who announced the lecture in his Spanish classes.

"I always encourage students to attend lectures about the Hispanic world and, as Stansifer says, there are things we can learn from Latin American countries."

To review why the majority of Latin American countries are non-democratic, Stansifer, past Latin American Studies Department head at the University of Kansas, said U.S. intervention in elections or other political proceedings repeatedly left countries expecting the United States to fix their problems or instigate the next governmental regime when one became particularly bad.

"The United States has historically favored democracy over dictatorship," Stansifer said. "The most severe interventions are in non-democratic governments like Panama, Cuba, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic."

Stansifer cited Costa Rica as an example of how U.S. intervention discourages democracy.

Costa Rica, the Latin American country considered most democratic, has only seen U.S. troops on its soil once. In 1919 American troops removed a dictator.

Since then, the U.S. has ignored the country, Stansifer said. The nation became democratic because of the lack of U.S. influence, and because of specific qualities the country has that cannot be created by U.S. foreign policy, a method the U.S. repeatedly tries to employ with other nations.

Costa Rica had no precious metals or large numbers of Indians that another country could exploit. These two traits kept other countries from invading and prohibited severe class separations and land divisions.

Later, the slow expansion of the coffee industry allowed the individual farmer to grow with the industry and discouraged the plantation system which also leads to class divisions.

Although these characteristics led Costa Rica to a democratic government, the U.S. can not replicate these factors to help begin democracies in other countries, Stansifer said.

In nations like Nicaragua, Panama and Cuba, Stansifer cited direct U.S. involvements as reasons why the nations have not become democratic.

Students in the heartland are learning about issues south of the border from the Latin American Awareness Lecture Series, sponsored by the revitalized Latin American Studies Program.

"U.S. Foreign Policy and Democracy in Central America" presented by Charles Stansifer from the University of Kansas was the third of seven lectures planned this semester to examine current political issues in Latin America.

The lecture series supplements classes offered this semester to students enrolled in Latin American Studies as a secondary major. Luis Perez, senior in political science, said he enrolled in the Latin American Studies Program to increase his chances to become a foreign area officer in the armed forces.

"My major in political science is a very broad field, this program allows me to tailor my studies to a specific region."

Perez said the program helps students to learn about the differences in cultures within Latin America.

"I would encourage language students to take some of the classes because one of the better ways to learn a language is to learn about the culture," Perez said.

Marnette Denell, senior in Spanish and political science, is enrolled in a Latin American Studies class this semester and said she plans to spend the summer in Latin America.

"I've studied American foreign policy in Europe, but I'm interested in Latin American issues," she said. "My Latin American Studies class is rounding out the rest of my education."

The lecture series and the Latin American Studies secondary major have been coordinated by Marcial Antonio Riquelme, associate professor in sociology, anthropology and social work.

"This kind of program enhances a student's qualifications for employment in research, economic development, social action, trade and diplomacy related to Latin America," Riquelme said.

"Some of my students want to join the Peace Corps, the State Department and the Red Cross," Riquelme said.

The interdisciplinary secondary major consists of courses in anthropology, geography, history, modern languages, political science and sociology.

Students can enroll in the secondary major or just take one or two classes in which they are interested.

States, leaving a dependent nation that did not have the motivation to choose a democratic government.

Likewise, Nicaragua ignored the public sentiment to oust Noriega and waited for U.S. intervention.

"There was a local movement to oust him (Noriega), but Panamanians were waiting for help from the U.S.," Stansifer said.

He added the U.S. didn't have the patience to wait for the Panamanian people to decide to create their own government.

Stansifer said, unlocking the doors of democracy in Latin America requires the United States to learn patience as did President Jimmy Carter when he denied Nicaraguan aid while the Latin American nations need to collectively pressure the U.S. government to stay at home and out of Latin American affairs.

That won't be a problem this season. Though he is only 6-8, if Sallier can repeat last year's performance against this season's smaller conference, he will be a terror.

Three other teams — Colorado, Nebraska and Iowa State — list virtually no one with experience or impressive credentials at the center spot. That leaves K-State.

What does the conference's new personality mean for the Wildcats?

First, by returning two true centers in John Rettiger and Darryl King the Cats suddenly have more experience at the center spot than any other Big Eight team. At a position that has been a weak spot for K-State squads for years, this tandem appears on paper to be a strength.

But more important is the flexibility Coach Dana Altman suddenly has with his lineup. By moving 6-8 forward Wylie Howard to the center spot, Altman creates room for another of his athletic newcomers who excel in a fast-paced game. Howard, who was too small to play center last season, has average height for the position this year.

Depth is improved as well. Hamilton Strickland and George Hill — two newcomers whose inexperience would have been exploited by veterans like Randall and Vandiver last year — may be ready to compete with the younger big men upon which other squads will be forced to rely.

Definitely, the conference has shed the domination of the big man. Games will most likely be faster paced and dominated by the Adonis Jordans and Anthony Peelters.

Balance Classwork with Practical Experience

Although a lot of knowledge is obtained in the classroom, there is still a wealth of experience you can only obtain through a work environment.

Now is your chance to hone your skills by working on the sixth largest morning daily newspaper in Kansas — the Kansas State Collegian.

The Collegian is now accepting applications for the spring 1992 editor and advertising manager.

Editor in Chief

Supervises all areas of Collegian news planning, training, personnel and production. Delegates duties in the best interest of the publication. Assists with staff recruitment, training and retention programs. Serves as a liaison between the newspaper and its readership, the K-State community.

Advertising Manager

Supervises all areas of advertising planning, training, personnel and production. The advertising manager is responsible for conducting weekly staff meetings, planning special sections and supplements, logging and laying out ads. Should work well with people and be well organized. Previous staff experience preferred. Experience or coursework in advertising is expected.

SGA ELECTIONS

SPECIAL PULL-OUT SECTION

SGA

Doug Stucky

Greek Junior in milling science

My name is Doug Stucky. I am a junior in the College of Agriculture majoring in milling science. As I look at our Student Senate and what the job of senator includes, I feel that my biggest goal as a senator is to work with the students. I will do this, in order to achieve the goals which we, the students, feel need to be taken care of at K-State. My qualifications include involvement in Block and Bridle, Collegiate FFA, Beta Theta Pi, and the Western Nights dance. I support funding for both Farrell Library and the Rec Complex expansion and the implementation of a transportation system with minimal cost to the students to alleviate the parking problems that the students face.

Sarah Fehr

Not Listed Freshman in agricultural economics

I feel that as a first-year student at K-State, I can bring a fresh and new approach to student government. Many times there are things that people want changed, but because everyone is used to doing those things in a certain way, no effort is made to get them to change. As a senator, I would be able to look at proposed issues and ideas without preconceived notions or prejudices.

Tracy Mader

Greek Freshman in agricultural economics

I would like to take this opportunity to introduce myself and share some of my ideas. My name is Tracy Mader and I am currently a sophomore in agricultural economics living in a greek house. As a student senator, I want to give the College of Agriculture a strong, fair voice in SGA affairs.

I would like to see a more equal distribution of the Educational Opportunity Fund, specifically those funds appropriated to competition teams in the College of Agriculture. As students, we need to be concerned about how competitive we are in the job market. An academic minors program would greatly enhance the attractiveness of K-State graduates in the eyes of employers. Student government needs to monitor the salaries paid to faculty to ensure K-State continues to have the best personnel run the University.

Some other areas important to me include implementing a community shuttle and problems with campus safety. My ideas on student issues are innovative, and I feel I can be a strong, fair voice in representing the College of Agriculture.

Brian Ochsner

Off Campus Senior in agricultural economics

I feel that it's essential that the College of Agriculture get reasonable levels of funding from the Educational Opportunity Fund in order to maintain the high quality of competition teams that we currently have.

In addition, I also believe that K-State needs a minors program. We're the only Big Eight University without one, and this situation needs to be brought to the attention of Faculty Senate. I also believe there must be a solution to alleviate the parking situation on campus. This could be done through the use of a shuttle bus system, and I feel it could be paid for solely through user fees. I'm in favor of passage of the Farrell Library and the Rec Complex referendums as these additions will enhance K-State's image as a first-rate educational institution in the future.

Jennifer Fullington

I feel very strongly with both issues of the library and expansion of the recreation center. This would be as good a time as any to pass these two issues. For, if we don't pass them who knows just how soon it would be before something would be done about them.

One thing that I am totally against is the idea of being charged to drop/add classes. I think that there could be some other alternative before relying to this.

Matt Kennedy

Residence Hall Senior in animal science and industry

As a student here for three years, I have seen our focus as a University broaden. I intend to continue that trend as a senator for the College of Agriculture.

Our Student Senate must plan for the future students and their needs, as well as those of our current students. To accomplish this, we must turn more of our attention to the State Legislature to petition for funding. K-State students pay for many items that the state traditionally funds at other universities.

Important issues that the Senate will give consideration are the proposed campus shuttle system, expansion of the library, development of academic minors and many others. All of these will affect current and future students. I hope to have a voice in deciding those issues.

Jeff Peterson

Greek Sophomore in Animal Sciences and Industry

I feel the opportunity K-State students have to improve their campus with the expansion of the Rec Complex and expansion and renovation of Farrell Library is the biggest issue in this election. The academic minors program is another issue many students have shown concern about that has been dropped due to lack of funding.

I feel there will be an effort to reinstate the minor program along with a search for a new source of funding. I am running for Student Senate in the College of Agriculture. I have lived in a residence hall and am currently living off campus and am a member of a fraternity. I strive to be accessible to my constituents in the College of Agriculture.

Brian Dunn

Greek Junior in animal science and industry

Currently I am a junior in the College of Agriculture. I have a diverse background of activities within the College of Agriculture and with my involvement in a fraternity, I feel I could serve the College of Agriculture effectively, drawing from my past experiences and associations with many of the students. I feel the College of Agriculture and its students are a very important part of the University and I will make every attempt to make sure my fellow ag students are well represented on Senate and that their views are expressed. I am always willing to listen to gripes, opinions and ideas that students in the College of Agriculture have. It is extremely important that the College of Agriculture and the ag senators continue to voice their opinions in Senate, as funding for ag competition teams and other programs continue to be cut. I would enjoy the honor of serving as senator for the College of Agriculture and putting the students' interests first and foremost.

Deloss Jahnke

Not Listed sophomore in agricultural journalism

I am a member of Agricultural Communicators of Tomorrow and as the club's freshman-sophomore vice president. I was chairman of the club's fund-raising event and will serve as the group's coordinator for Ag Science Day. I am also a member of a greek house, of which I serve as the chapter secretary.

I support the referendums for the Rec Complex and Farrell Library. Campus safety is always very important, and there are areas on campus that can be improved. I also support funding for competitive judging teams within the College of Agriculture.

Andy Clawson

Off Campus Junior in animal science and industry

Being actively involved in several ag organizations, presently living off campus, and formally being exposed to residence hall and fraternity living, I feel I already have insight to students' concerns. I am interested in the welfare of the entire College of Agriculture, and I am very accessible and eager to address everyone's interests.

My main goal as senator is to continually gain input from students and to consult them on their viewpoints and ideas as to more adequately represent them in SGA.

I would like to see the image of the College of Agriculture improve. Also, I want to represent the college in a way that outstanding contributions and achievements which consistently prevail in the College of Agriculture.

Mike Zamrzla

Greek Sophomore, agricultural journalism

I am running for a senate position in the College of Agriculture because I want to be part of representative body that is not only aware but also responsive to the needs of all the students at K-State. While here at K-State, I've been involved in a number of college related and Universitywide organizations. This involvement has exposed me to a wide variety of students views that I feel will be beneficial in representing the College of Agriculture on Student Senate.

As a senator, I will represent by doing more than just making myself available, but also by taking the initiative to attend and participate in departmental meetings within the College of Agriculture so that by working together all students can make a positive difference in K-State and the College of Agriculture.

Kristin Ratzlaff

Residence Hall Junior in elementary education

As a prospective senator, my main concern lies in the quality of the programs that the College of Education provides. It is evident that, due to budget cuts by the state, the education program has suffered and will continue to suffer if adequate funds are not provided.

Such circumstances are not conducive to a proper education. Informing students of these obstacles and getting these students involved in student government is one way to improve the situation. After all, the university is for the students, and it is the students' responsibility to prove this. I would like to see more students get involved in the Student Government Association, which each student is a member of.

Working together toward common goals will create a more unified campus, and as a senator, it would be my desire to make this possible.

SGA

Amber Heidler

Not Listed Freshman in pre-professional elementary education

Hi! My name is Amber Heidler and I'm running for the Student Senate in the College of Education. I am a sophomore in Elementary Education as well as Early Childhood Development. I feel that my active participation in high school student government, leadership conferences and the Hall Governing Board at Goodnow, have given me the experience and qualifications needed for this position. The issues concerning an academic minors program, a campus shuttle service, and an expanded library and recreation center are very important to me. I am very concerned about students' rights, and making sure the independent student has equal representation in Student Government. If elected I will be readily accessible and would take time to talk to individuals and groups to learn what their experiences are.

Carol Schul

Greek Sophomore in pre-professional elementary education

My biggest concern in running for Education Senator is the need for better communication between the students and Senate.

I feel the students should be better informed and their opinions need to be taken into greater consideration. Finally, I feel that the students need to be a bigger part of the decisions that are made for Kansas State.

I think this can be done by communicating through the classroom. We need to get input from the students and relate that back to senate. Also, I would give students the opportunity to offer suggestions by being available to work with anyone who has ideas or concerns.

In conclusion, I would encourage everyone to get out and vote for the important issues we are facing.

Camille Rohleder

Not Listed Junior in pre-professional elementary education

Qualifications: freshman yr. senate intern, sophomore yr. senator, fall junior yr. student affairs & social services chairman. I have been involved with student government since I began my education at K-State. My current concerns are the Rec Complex additions and Farrell Library renovation. I hope to become familiar with my constituents' wants and needs so I may fairly represent their position in student government. I hope to also bring education council in better contact with student government issues and voice their ideas with Senate as well.

EDUCATION

Sondra Sewell

Greek Sophomore in pre-professional elementary education

I am running for one of the five positions as Student Senator to the College of Education. I know this is a responsibility which involves a big time commitment, and I am willing to give my time to help the Student Body in any way possible.

As far as the issues of Farrell and the Rec Complex are concerned, I would strongly encourage students to vote "yes." These are two issues which need a lot of attention and have not been approved in the past.

The other issues concerning the student body include minors program, shuttle service and security. These are all very important and hopefully they will be resolved during this term of office. These issues are all in the effort to assist the student body. We need to carefully consider each of them and come up with a resolution to please the student body as a whole.

This brings me to my last goal, to help develop a better relationship between the senators and the student body. The student body sometimes doesn't get recognized for its needs and wants, and that needs to change.

Amy Smith

Greek Sophomore undecided

If I were elected to the Student Senate, my main goals would be to help institute a minors program and to help further state funding of KSU. I feel it would be my job to vote in the best interests of my constituents and my college; not only in my best interests.

I feel I am qualified to hold this position and have the desire to serve my University in this way.

Shanna Robben

Not Listed Junior in pre-professional secondary education

As future educators, students in the College of Education realize the importance of perception. A teacher must be able to see things as his/her students see them so that his/her methods of teaching will be effective. However, the teacher also realizes that the responsibility is not merely his/hers. The students themselves have a responsibility to make their needs and views known to their teacher. This aids in the perception the teacher holds.

Being a junior in Sec. Education, I believe my perception is very similar to all of yours, getting the best education we pay for. I will represent my fellow educators positively and effectively putting your needs first. However, I feel you students also have a responsibility. Involvement of all students is a key factor in student government. If elected, I will make myself available to any and all suggestions that students may have at any time. My dedication to this position as a senator is similar to my dedication as a future educator. It being to underlie every decision I make with the confidence that the needs of all students will be met.

HUMAN ECOLOGY

Laura Riley

Residence Hall Senior in hotel/restaurant management

As a senior in hotel/restaurant management, I take great pride in the College of Human Ecology. I see the position of senator as an excellent opportunity to serve the College and the University. I feel it is important to be aware of current issues and take part in actions necessary, and as senator, I intend to listen and act upon the concerns of students.

I have to stress the importance for the student body to exercise their right to vote. It is important for students in the College of Human Ecology, considering the scare we had last year concerning reorganization. The protest did cause the administration to realize that Human Ecology has been part of K-State for a reason; however, we are still facing tight budgets. I want to work to protect the interests of the College of Human Ecology.

On election days, we will vote on two referendums. They have to do with the expansions of the library and the Rec Complex. I am in favor of both proposals because student fees will not be affected, and this may be our last opportunity for funding library expansion.

I would appreciate your vote on Nov. 5 and 6.

I am running for student senator with two goals in mind. First, that since the Student Government Association includes the entire student body, I would like to increase student awareness of current issues and encourage as much student involvement as possible in direct decision making. I enjoy discussing ideas with my fellow students and have always strove to be as open minded and sensitive to diverse viewpoints.

Second, I hope to continue to approach issues with optimal opportunities for the lowest possible fees to students in mind.

Library renovation is one of my priorities. I also am in support of the minor program.

As an enthusiastic returning senator, I am well accustomed to the means by which Senate functions. Since this election is for a short term, I hope to facilitate efficiency during the transition period.

I feel very strongly with both issues of the library and expansion of the recreation center.

This would be as good a time as any to pass these two issues. For, if we don't pass them who knows just how soon it would be before something would be done about them.

One thing that I am totally against is the idea of being charged to drop/add classes. I think that there could be some other alternative before relying to this.

Getting the students to understand Student government better, finding out what the students want and representing them in student government is my main goal.

Basically, I'm sick of all the non-constructive crap that goes on in Senate. I have new ideas without the constant pressure to follow the norm of Student Senate.

I am running for graduate student senator to represent the interests and opinions of graduate students. I believe my experiences as student body president and student senator will be beneficial to the Student Senate in making the transition between the fall and spring elections. Some of the issues I would like to have Senate address are as follows:

1. Passage of the one-person-one-vote measure when electing student senators;
2. Limit the expenditures made by Student Body President candidates to $300, maybe even less, (currently $849.50) to make the race more competitive and open to more than those who can afford to run;
3. Continue support for 100-percent fee waiver for graduate teaching assistants;
4. Continue the efforts to secure passage of the academic minors degree program by Faculty Senate;
5. Continue the development of a Manhattan/campus shuttle system and support the purchase of two handicapped-accessible shuttles to make better use of the outlying parking lots while better servicing the needs of the physically challenged;
6. Oppose, at all cost, the implementation of a fee that would be charged every time students dropped or added a class; and
7. Improve the allocation process by requiring student senators and finance committee members to attend group meetings of those who request funding from Senate.

After graduating from K-State in 1989 with a bachelor's in management, I accepted a position in private industry with the intent on getting my master's while working. After spending two years away from college, I decided that there was no place I would rather continue my education than in Manhattan at K-State. I will never regret making this decision.

In the next decade, we will see declining enrollments at universities across the country as numbers of graduating high school seniors will be declining. This university is committed to an enrollment management concept whereby we concentrate on maintaining enrollment not only through recruitment but retention. We must continue to improve student services through such measures as improving Farrell Library and the Rec Complex in order to keep the students we currently enroll.

Kuppusamy Ravindran

Derek Jackson

My views on Student Senate relate to the point that students have a tremendous amount of responsibility and influence on the function of the University. I support any opportunity for students to express themselves either by vote or by forum because of this belief. I think that Student Senate needs to have closer communications with its constituency.

There needs to be a call from the student to those who are responsible for the educational system about the conditions of learning at Kansas State. Students are having enough trouble funding their own education without having to pay for items that historically have been funded by the state.

I would like to see Student Senate look at the long-range future of the University and do something about it. There is a need to understand the many issues which are being addressed, such as parking, overcrowding class size, funding of educational buildings and many more. These issues are facing students today, but we will probably never see the end results of our actions.

Elections corrections

Due to time and space constraints, a number of errors appeared in Tuesday's SGA Elections section of the Collegian.

Also, Mark Evans was incorrectly identified as an arts and sciences candidate. He is an engineering candidate.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

While I support the Library and Rec Referendums, the Student Senate's work on these issues is done. With a short senate term, the most important issue will be allocating student funds to campus organizations. Two other important items will be to first, re-issue the proposed miners program and try to pressure the Faculty Senate to pass it also. Second, try to bring back integrity and respect to student government.

Jim Spencer

Issues supported: Farrell Library referendum, rec complex, shuttle bus system, improved lighting on the outskirts of campus, reinstatement of campout, reduced football/basketball ticket prices and greater interaction between athletes and the rest of the student body.

Why I am running: I am running for Student Senate for several reasons. First, I think ethics need to be infused into Senate, and I believe that I will be able to do that because of my honesty, integrity and desire to serve the students of KSU.

Secondly, I feel that Senate needs to be more accountable to the students. If elected, I will ask students how they want me to vote on the issues. I want to be a representative, not a self-styled politician who knows all the right answers.

Lastly, I am running because I am concerned about the lack of equity in Senate regarding the living quarters of the senators. At present, there are very few senators who live in residence halls. Considering the number of students who live in residence halls, I think that they should have easier access to senators than they have now.

Protests remembered

Despite the cold weather Tuesday, a crowd of nearly 200 gathered on Union Plaza. The event was in honor of the anniversary of last year's protests against reorganization and the possible elimination of the Colleges of Human Ecology and Architecture and Design.

Remember Reorganization Day celebrated by 200 with rally, march

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

The heated reorganization protests of one year ago were remembered Tuesday as about 200 people gathered for a rally in front of Seaton Hall and marched to Anderson Hall.

"We want to make sure people don't forget," said Scott Haley, graduate student in regional and community planning, who helped organize Remember Reorganization Day.

Last fall, President Jon Wefald announced a reorganization plan that included closing the colleges of Architecture and Design and Human Ecology. Vehement objection from students, faculty and alumni culminated in about 2,000 people marching through and around Anderson and rallying on the lawn in front of the building Oct. 31.

The plan was dropped a few days later.

Tuesday's event was a remembrance, Haley said, not another protest.

Its intent was to tell new students about reorganization, to remind those involved what they went through and to remind administrators and the Kansas Board of Regents that Wefald had declared the colleges of Architecture and Design and Human Ecology vital to the University when he withdrew the plan.

The three speakers at the rally celebrated what the protests had accomplished and asked people to remain active in continuing reorganization efforts.

The University is a community of scholars and a unity of disciplines, not just an economic venture, Gary Coates, professor of architecture said.

"The reorganization plan raised some fundamental questions about what a university is, what the aim and purpose of education is," Coates said.

The colleges threatened by the plan received much campuswide support, because it made people realize their own vulnerability, he said.

Dennis Law, head of the Department of Landscape Architecture, suggested a big party be thrown every year early in November to commemorate the protests.

On a more serious note, he said quality should be the first consideration in decisions about resource allocations.

"If K-State cannot use quality as a standard for the future, then there will be no future for K-State," Law said.

Wefald and Provost James Coffman should be applauded for withdrawing the plan, Law said, and he asked his audience to thank them for their commitment to keeping the University comprehensive.

Lyle Hornbaker, senior in architecture, emphasized in his speech the passion of the protests and encouraged people to sustain it.

"We got the people responsible for the plan to stand before the students and answer their questions," he said. "The efforts of the students, faculty and alumni caused the shelving of that plan."

Students need to make their opinions heard through avenues such as their college councils and parents, Hornbaker said, as well as communicate with state and University decision makers.

"Invite regents and legislators to visit campus, so they can make the right decisions based on the true nature of our school," he said.

In turn, he asked that lawmakers consult students and administrators before continuing to cut funds to the state university system.

After the speeches, Haley directed the crowd to march to the front of Anderson. There, he called for a moment of silence to remember last year's rally at the same spot.

"As I look out here today, I remember what happened a year ago,"

Haley said. "We had the T-squares in the ground and the Human Ecology people out here."

One of the anniversary rally's main points was to maintain awareness of reorganization, Haley said.

While he was posting signs about Remember Reorganization Day in Seaton, he said, a new student watching him asked, "What's reorganization?"

"It made me feel apprehensive, because this can occur again," Haley said.

"It's definitely still out there."

Upward Bound program helps area students

Stipend motivates interested people to go to college

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

Getting paid to study sounds like a desperate measure to get today's high school students into college, but not to Upward Bound.

The mission of the Upward Bound program is to get first-generation college students and students from economically disadvantaged backgrounds into college, said Director Reggie McGowan.

This year, 72 high school students from Junction City, Manhattan, Riley County and Rock Creek high schools are participating in the program.

A maximum stipend of $5 a week is available to these students if they attend all the required programs.

"The amount may not seem large, but it's a motivator for low-income families. However, students do get more out of it than just the money," said Lora Boyer, academic services coordinator.

Some of the required programs include academic resource sessions, after-school tutoring if needed, career days and social/cultural events.

Much of the tutoring is in math and science.

"These subjects tend to intimidate students because they require a more analytic way of thinking," said McGowan. "Hopefully, we can reduce the fear students have of math and science."

Occasionally, however, these informal study sessions, at which popcorn and drinks are served, get a bit out of hand and Boyer has to use a microphone to quiet the 72 voices.

"OK, we're getting a bit too noisy. Let's study now and we can socialize later," Boyer announced.

Upward Bound is partially funded by the federal government, so the program cannot act as a recruitment agency for K-State. But, about 60 percent of the high school graduates in the program go to K-State, McGowan said.

Miranda Channel, senior at Junction City High School, has been in the program since the summer of her eighth-grade year.

"My sister was in it, and she always talked about it so I decided to join," she said. "I've never been able to study by myself."

Channel said she plans to go to K-State because it's close to home and she wants to major in psychology.

Over the summer, Upward Bound has a session that gives high schoolers an opportunity to live on campus and simulate college life.

As McGowan said, "This might be the first experience these students have with being away from home. They see what it's like to live in a group situation. They learn how to give and take."

The percentage of Upward Bound students who actually enroll in post-secondary education is hard to track, McGowan said, but the national estimate ranges anywhere from 35-50 percent.

"Our numbers are about 65 percent, but that doesn't say who persists and finishes. It no longer takes students four years to graduate, so that makes tracking them even more difficult," McGowan said.

Groups protest Columbus

Some American Indians blame explorer for deaths

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

Sailing to discover the New World in 1492, Christopher Columbus sunk the Native Americans' world and culture. Many Native American groups have begun to protest Columbus Day's celebration.

Nine million Indians died within 10 years of Columbus' landing, said Thurman Williams, junior in mechanical engineering and American Indian Sciences and Engineering Society vice president.

"The damage is so immense it's hard to imagine," Williams said.

Approximately 95 percent of the native population was wiped out, mostly from European diseases, said Harald Prins, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

As much of the world begins a year-long celebration of the 500th anniversary of Columbus' arrival, Native Americans, Amazon indigenous people, some Mexicans and the National Council of the Churches of Christ have begun a national attack on the celebration, Prins said, who specializes in Native American studies.

"For many of us, it's very demeaning that we celebrate his (Columbus) arrival," said Native American Student Body President Darren Geimausaddle, senior in psychology.

He won't refer to Columbus' landing as a discovery because he believes a land that is already inhabited by humans cannot be discovered.

"Because it's called a discovery, it's demeaning to those who had ancestors here before Columbus arrived," Geimausaddle said.

Internationally, the world is spending a lot on this celebration, Prins said, citing two sets of actual-sized ships built for the festivities. One set will sail the Atlantic to re-enact Columbus' voyage, and the other will be on display at the World's Fair in Spain. The Dominican Republic is funding a $20-million lighthouse, and the U.S. Congress established a commission in 1984 for the Christopher Columbus Quincentary Jubilee.

"Euro-America sees this arrival of Columbus as a blessing," Prins said. "In a multicultural society of today, there are many different historical accounts that say differently."

Many Columbus protesters attribute the world-wide pro-Columbus attitude to history teaching methods. Geimausaddle said American schools have "failed because we haven't told the real story of what happened."

The Columbus Year celebration began on Columbus Day 1991 and will continue through Columbus Day 1992, as will a nationwide protest against the festivities.

American Indians dumped buckets of blood-like liquid in Denver streets on Columbus Day to protest the lives lost after Columbus' arrival. Native American group members at K-State wore black armbands in mourning.

"Native Americans want to draw attention and to show that the arrival of Columbus was a loss of homeland and our culture," Geimausaddle said.

"Charcoal produces carbon monoxide, which is very, very risky and can ultimately result in death," he said.

Meyer said most students who rent are looking for inexpensive ways to keep warm.

"Making sure cracks are covered up and windows covered with plastic are a couple ways students can help keep the cold out," he said.

Rodriguez said felt and rubber are also helpful to put up against a window.

Another way students can save money is by turning the thermostat off when they go to class, Meyer said.

"People will see a 10-15 percent reduction on their monthly bill," he said.

which is against voting rules. "They would say 'I can't remember who I wanted to vote for,' and I told them to write it out on notebook paper if they want," she said.

Woodbury said she is glad there are only two polling places.

She was referring to legislation recently introduced and rejected by Senate that would have mandated a total of five stations.

"We couldn't find enough people to work the polling stations at some times during the day," she said. "There's no way if we would have to have five times as many poll workers."

The Union polling station stayed open until 6:30 p.m. Tuesday and will reopen at 7:30 a.m. today.

large items.

Other roofs that will be replaced this year are the Bushnell Annex, part of Dykstra Hall, and part of Seaton Court, Rice said. Rice said Facilities sends a crew out to each of the buildings twice a year to inspect the condition of the roofs. He said they are then graded to determine which are in the most need of replacement.

Buildings up for roof replacement in fiscal year 1993 are Kedzie Hall, the Art Building and Seaton Court, he said.

The ninth floor of Haymaker Hall also experienced ceiling leaks because of the buildup of sleet on the roof. One room had to be vacated, said Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent of the Housing Department. Wiley said the room probably won't be ready for use until next semester because of other problems.

Wiley said the residence halls rarely have leakage problems but it was because of the unusual amount of sleet that Haymaker leaked this time.

"Everytime we have six inches of sleet this is going to happen," he said.

He said the accumulation was settling in instead of running off the roof. Farrell Library wasn't without leaks, either.

Jean McDonald, administrative services officer for Farrell, said the leaks began last Thursday and have affected mostly the old part of the building. She said they have noticed leaks on the eighth stack level as well as floor-to-floor leaks because of the way the stacks are built.

The library has also had part of the plaster in one of the offices fall off, and leaking in one of the skylights, she said.

"We've had a good response from Facilities in getting them (the leaks) fixed," she said. "The patching seems to be working, but we are still experiencing some leaks in the old part of the building."

So far, damage to the books has been slight, but McDonald said that doesn't mean there won't be future damage.

"I would hesitate to say there has been no damage. We still run the risk of mildew and mold damaging the books," she said.

Referendums pass; run-off needed

Library, Recreation Complex proposals both succeed with overwhelming percentages

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

Referendums for the expansion of Farrell Library and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex were overwhelmingly passed by students in this year's general election.

Over 5,500 voters cast ballots this year, the second-highest voter turnout in history, according to Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life.

"It's pretty incredible that there are enough students concerned enough to come out in the cold and snow and vote," Franklin said.

Over 97 percent voted for Farrell's expansion, the highest approval rating in history. With the approval, $5 million will be raised through student fees to expand Farrell — a potent bargaining chip when dealing with alumni and Topeka officials, President Jon Wefald said.

"I think it is good news for the students, the faculty and the entire University," Wefald said. "It means the library now has $7 million collected, counting the $2 million donation from alumni."

"I think this vote shows commitment on the part of the faculty and students and puts us in a good position to raise the remainder of the alumni contributions and put the subject before the state at year's end," Wefald said.

Franklin echoed Wefald's comments.

"The real message is that students have settled it in their minds that building an academic building is OK," he said. "This sends a strong message to Topeka and the alumni to match the students in support of the library.

Charlene Grass, associate dean of libraries, said the vote was a shot in the arm for her department.

"That's wonderful," she said. "It's just great. It's just what we needed to get a library built."

The Rec Center's vote was nearly as impressive, with 81 percent approving expansion. The $7.9 million raised will go toward remodeling parts of the existing building to help with overcrowding and traffic-flow problems the center is experiencing.

Also, a larger weight and fitness area, an additional four-court gymnasium area with a longer, elevated running track would be added. Several other minor projects will also be addressed.

Recreational Services Director Raydon Robel said, "It speaks well of the students and the support and confidence they have in our program."

The turnout caught Wefald's eye

Fred Wingert got the call he expected.

The caller was Ann Woodbury, junior in business administration and elections committee chairwoman, with the results of the student body election.

"Are you calling to order pizza?" Wingert asked as the election-night party group gathered around him to hear the results of the election.

Wingert finished first in the student body presidential election with 1,874 votes. Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics, finished second with 958 votes and will battle Wingert in a run-off election Nov. 12. Shawn Bruce, Craig Uhrich, Roy Cessna, Todd Giefer and Luis Perez followed respectively.

Both referendums on the ballot passed by wide margins. "Yes" votes for the Farrell Library expansion totaled 97 percent of ballots cast while those for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex expansion totaled 81 percent.

Though Wingert and his supporters believed he would finish near the top, McClaskey was not as confident about her chances.

"I feel really good," Wingert said afterwards. "I'm looking forward to this next week."

"I'm pleased, obviously," said Bart Spachek, junior in marketing and Wingert's campaign treasurer. "But I didn't think we'd have that many votes ahead of the other candidates."

McClaskey's call came to Rusty's Outback in Aggieville, where she and her supporters were waiting for the Fed cuts bank rate .5 percent

Major banks follow Federal Reserve; prime lending rate drops to five-year low

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve pushed a key interest rate to an 18-year low on Wednesday in a fresh effort to jump-start the national economy and keep it from sliding back into recession.

ECONOMY

Major banks followed immediately with a cut in their prime lending rates, lowering the benchmark for many consumer and business loans to a five-year low of 7.5 percent. However, analysts questioned whether the moves would be enough.

President Bush said he was concerned about slipping consumer confidence but suggested hopefully that Americans "will suddenly wake up," notice rates are down and go out and buy cars and houses.

Private economists were far more pessimistic as they surveyed a glut of weak economic statistics showing rising unemployment and plummeting confidence.

The Federal Reserve announced that it was slashing its discount rate, the interest it charges to make direct loans to commercial banks, from 5 percent to 4.5 percent, the lowest level since January 1973.

Later in the day, the central bank signaled that it was lowering its target for the federal funds rate, the interest that banks charge each other, by a quarter-point to 4.75 percent.

It marked the 13th time the Fed has nudged the funds rate lower and the fifth time it has cut the discount rate since the recession began in July 1990.

But many analysts said they doubted that the latest round of rate cuts would do much to get jittery consumers spending again, given the huge overhang of consumer debt from the 1980s and fears about further job layoffs. Many economists said they had revised their forecasts to increase the chance of a double-dip recession.

"This is a very troubled economy,"

WHAT IT MEANS

■ Lawmakers hope lowering interest rates will cause consumers to take out more loans and spend more money, giving the national economy a boost.

■ Critics contend banks will not lower interest rates on loans and credit cards enough for the plan to work.

said Allen Sinai, chief economist of the Boston Co. "There was some snapback in the spring in manufacturing, housing and consumer spending, but all three areas look as though they have run out of steam."

Soldiers happy to be back home

Company members return after 11-month Persian Gulf tour

DAVID FRESE
A&E/Features Editor

FORT RILEY — Staff Sgt. McDaniel Rawlings waited in the wings of Craig Gym Wednesday night for his fellow soldiers to return to the base. The buses were late. This time, they said, because of the weather.

Rawlings had returned Tuesday night as an advance party for the 556th Maintenance Company. He and his company had left for Saudi on a cold night last January, not unlike this November one — one of the last to go to Saudi and the last to return. He had a lot of catching up to do with his friends. He talked with them about the Bulls, the Twins, the Cats. He laughed though he was tired.

"Jet lag, man," he said. "I've got some serious jet lag."

The 556th returning Wednesday had been in the Gulf for 10 months tidying up after the war. They had cleaned machinery, sent home the weapons, washed the trucks.

Rawlings said it was hard to believe. Less than a week ago he was sweating and trying to keep the Army's trucks from getting stuck in the sand. Wednesday night he was trying to keep from slipping on the ice.

His girls had grown so much, he bragged. The littlest was walking. The eldest was talking. Too much.

"When I left she could only say a few words," he said. "Now she's talking me to death. When I woke up this morning at 5 a.m. she just talked, talked."

The girls had danced while their father talked about them. The Fort Riley band had been playing Army songs, America songs. But the band members put down their instruments because it would be awhile before the soldiers got in.

The post was a little different since the war ended and the first few groups of soldiers started coming back.

There was talk about the recent rash of crimes since the soldiers had come back home. Some of the reporters gathered gossiped about the shooting of the Quik Shop girl last month. They had their theories about why the two soldiers arrested for the crime did it, of course, but the journalists could find no one to go on the record about the murder, least of all Fort Riley public affairs personnel.

Outbreak of genital warts reported

Rampant public health problem worries Lafene staff

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

Twenty cases of genital warts have been reported at Lafene Health Center.

Human papilloma virus, also known as genital warts, is an area of public health that has run rampant.

Dr. Larry Moeller, Lafene chief of staff, said he is worried and hopes students will become more aware of the epidemic.

HPV contains a family of at least 60 viruses, about one-third of which cause genital problems that affect both males and females. Genital warts are one kind of lesion caused by HPV.

According to Staff Physician Paula Davis, genital warts are transmitted through sexual contact, whether it be oral, anal or by sexual intercourse.

"The spread of HPV is through sexual contact," Davis said. "However, it can also spread through use of shared clothing, especially wet towels."

Moeller said, "Of the 60 types of HPV, a large percentage are not physically apparent."

Twenty of the 60 types of HPV are infectors of the genitals, and 13 to 14 are predisposers of cancer, which specifically targets the female cervix. It also presents a higher risk of cancer in males.

"Twenty-five percent of the adult population have HPV," Moeller said. "Thirty percent of people who have HPV don't show the physical symptoms, and 70 percent of people having genital warts don't show any symptoms."

Moeller said symptoms, if any, ■ See WARTS Page 5

Objector dishonorably discharged

FORT RILEY (AP) — A Persian Gulf conscientious objector was dishonorably discharged and sentenced to four months of confinement at a disciplinary facility, military officials said.

As part of his court-martial for desertion, John K. Pruner, 25, of Fort Riley, was dropped in rank from sergeant to private and forfeited all pay and allowances, officials said.

The court-martial ended Oct. 30, but the military withheld information about it until Wednesday.

Pruner was reported absent without leave and declared a deserter in December. He had unsuccessfully challenged in federal court the Army's policy on the filing of conscientious objector applications. He surrendered to authorities at Fort Dix, N.J., in January.

Pruner filed for conscientious objector status after the 1st Infantry Division was called up Nov. 8, 1990, for deployment to the Middle East.

KU official resigns over poor remarks

LAWRENCE (AP) — A University of Kansas official who allegedly made disparaging remarks about an Indian woman and homosexuals has resigned from his job.

James Turner was the university's director of affirmative action. He had been on paid leave since Oct. 28 pending completion of a university investigation into remarks he reportedly made to student newspaper reporters.

School officials received Turner's letter of resignation Tuesday.

Del Shankel, executive vice chancellor, said the university accepted Turner's resignation effective Dec.

17. "I realize that published comments attributed to me have made it impossible for me to represent effectively the cause of affirmative action at the University of Kansas," Turner's letter said. "I regret any embarrassment that comments attributed to me have caused the university or the office I have served."

Efforts to reach Turner for additional comment were unsuccessful.

Shankel declined to say whether Turner had resigned because of the results of the university's investigation.

Iran-Contra investigations continue

WASHINGTON — Prosecutors on Wednesday questioned former Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams as they sought to show that a one-time aide to President Bush was implicated in the scandal, sources familiar with the investigation said.

Prosecutors also have subpoenaed former National Security Council aide Oliver North and for questioning as part of the effort to show Iran-Contra involvement on the part of Donald Gregg, now the U.S. ambassador to Korea.

Gregg was Bush's national security adviser in the Reagan era when Bush was vice president.

Two sources familiar with the investigation, speaking on condition of anonymity, described the North subpoena and questioning of Abrams before a federal grand jury as a last-ditch effort to show that Gregg has been covering up his knowledge of the affair.

Gregg has denied knowing about North's resupply operation to the Nicaraguan Contras and never told Bush about it.

Bush said he was unaware of North's network until it was publicly exposed late in 1986.

Abrams pleaded guilty to a pair of misdemeanors in the scandal on Oct. 7 and the former assistant secretary for inter-American Affairs agreed to cooperate with Iran-Contra prosecutors.

North oversaw the supply of weapons to the Contras for two years after Congress cut off military aid to the Nicaraguan rebels.

Gregg in 1985 arranged for ex-CIA operative Felix Rodriguez to go to El Salvador, where Rodriguez eventually went to work for North's Contra operation.

Soviets pledge food, homes

U.S.S.R. leaders promise domestic aid on eve of Revolution Day

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — As a dispirited Soviet Union prepared for the 74th anniversary of a revolution that promised peace, land and bread, authorities pledged free housing and affordable bread and meat to Moscow residents Wednesday.

Despite the pledges, the Soviet mood seemed more despondent on the eve of Revolution Day, once the most hallowed Communist holiday.

President Mikhail Gorbachev, speaking in the Kremlin, said Soviets should not cross the Communist holiday off their calendar. But Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin signed a decree abolishing the Communist Party in his republic. The party had been suspended nationwide since the failed hard-line coup last August.

Although most Soviets seem apprehensive of the post-Communist future, few are willing to speak out in favor of the former ruling party.

"Thank God that holiday is passing us by after 73 years. What holiday? Thank God all that is finally over," said Ivan Stremby, an engineer interviewed in front of a crowded and disorderly Moscow food store.

Panicked by the prospect of higher prices,

Muscovites crowded into bakeries and grocery stores for the third straight day, pushing, shoving and sometimes shouting as supplies dwindled quickly.

"We received bread as usual this morning, but we ran out at 11 a.m.," said Galina Makarova, a clerk in a Moscow bread store.

Seeking calm, Moscow Mayor Gavril Popov promised to allow residents to take possession of their current housing at no cost. He also said coupons would be issued in an effort to guarantee low-cost bread, meat, sausage, butter and eggs in the face of expected price rises.

Gorbachev, also seeking to defuse public anger, said foreign governments would help keep food supplies at current levels.

Just back from meetings with President Bush and French President Francois Mitterrand, Gorbachev gave no details. But Ivan Silayev, the senior Soviet economic official, told reporters finance ministers of the seven leading industrial democracies had assured him a Soviet debt crunch "will be settled with the help of Western credits" within 10 days.

Silayev did not specify the source or amount of the money, which could be a big boost for the nation and for Gorbachev's crippled central government.

Gorbachev and Yeltsin scored a joint victory in their effort to stop the disintegration of the nation, as the Ukraine and Moldavia agreed to sign an economic pact for a Soviet common market. The Ukraine, Yeltsin, president of the largest Soviet republic, was planning to sign a series of radical economic decrees to protect the population against price increases and reduce government control over foreign trade and currency exchange rates. He could sign the decrees as early as Thursday, spokesman Pavel Voshchanov said.

Yeltsin, who has been gathering power at Gorbachev's expense, said last week he would end government control on prices and start shifting factories, farms and businesses from state to private ownership by the end of the year.

Lafene urges students to get influenza vaccinations soon

November cited as best month to protect against flu season

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

As influenza season nears, Lafene Health Center recommends that high-risk students be vaccinated in November to combat the disease that can lead to pneumonia.

Dr. Andrew Pelletier, acting state epidemiologist of the Department of Disease Control, said there have not been unusually high number of flu cases, despite some reports.

Influenza is often mistaken for the stomach flu or diarrhea. The virus usually strikes in late December or early January, and the season continues through March, Pelletier said.

"Literature suggests not to vaccinate until November, otherwise the vaccination can lower a patient's resistance by the time the influenza season arrives," said Dr. Larry Moeller, Lafene Chief of Staff.

People with health conditions such as asthma, emphysema, diabetes or heart disease, along with chronic bronchitis, kidney disease or anemia, are considered high risk, Moeller said.

He also identified immune system problems such as cancer, recent organ transplant, absence of spleen or HIV infection as problems that require the vaccination.

Anyone over 65 years old should also be vaccinated.

Moeller recommends roommates or people who spend a large amount of time with people affected by these health problems should receive the vaccine also.

Often believed to be stomach flu because of the name, influenza is a respiratory virus resembling a severe cold. Symptoms are fever, chills, hot and cold flashes, a dry cough, headaches and muscle and joint aches.

The virus can lead to pneumonia, which can be fatal. Moeller said elderly die every year from influenza-induced pneumonia.

In past years, the campus has suffered influenza outbreaks. Two years ago, Lafene treated almost 400 cases a day, but last year, the virus seemed to be more dormant.

"Influenza usually affects large sections of the population in a short period," according to an article in The Journal of Respiratory Diseases.

Because vaccine supply is limited, Moeller requests that low-risk students wait until late November to be vaccinated.

OPINION

EDITORIALS

When it rains, it pours — on Denison

Been in Denison Hall lately?

Many students and teachers have recently found they have no reason to go. Some classes scheduled in the building have been canceled (including tests) due to water leaking from melting snow.

George Keiser, professor of English, has been forced to retreat from the advancing water that has taken over his office.

The room that once was Keiser's office still contains a computer terminal, a telephone and a lot of books — all covered with plastic. Buckets stand along one wall to catch the water, and a sign that warns anyone entering the room not to use the lights because of the hazard of electrical shock covers the light switch.

The water has claimed a shelf of books. Keiser was forced to throw them away because they were saturated.

Although Keiser's case is an extreme one, he does face the prospect of having his office in his house until the weather improves.

According to Keiser, the English department has been promised a new roof for the past five years.

According to the assistant vice president of facilities, the Denison roof is 30 years old — 10 years older than the average life of campus roofs.

And leaking roofs aren't the only problem Denison faces. A leaky heating system and water coming in from the ground every time the grass is watered keeps the building damp.

Quick fixes aren't going to solve anything. And, although the contract to fix Denison's roof is out for bid right now, a new roof is way down the road.

Something must be done now. Provisions should be made for students and faculty who are washed out of their rooms.

If the roofs are to remain in disrepair, perhaps the University should consider alternatives. Perhaps teachers should be given a bonus to pay for raincoats to pass out and umbrellas with each test paper to shelter desks.

Common courtesy not too much to ask

K-State had a couple of great speeches last week. The first was from a man who professed to know about Satanism. The second was the recent Landon Lecture by Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, Democratic presidential candidate.

Though the two speeches had little in common as far as content goes, they both had a few unwanted participants.

The Satan speaker, as well as people who were trying to ask him questions, was interrupted many times by the audience.

At the Wilder lecture, President Jon Wefald stood and walked around behind the governor while he answered questions from those who were allowed to ask them.

Wefald is probably unaware he's doing this, but he did it at the Carter lecture last spring and at the David Boren lecture last month, too.

The people at the Satanism talk probably went looking for trouble, and some would argue — some audience members tried to — they had as much right to speak as the lecturer.

But a lecture is a time for the person speaking to say what he or she came to say. It's not a forum. It's not a free-for-all. It's a lecture.

Question-and-answer sessions should be self-explanatory. They are to ask questions, not to give a speech of your own or verbally attack the speaker.

What people say and do while someone else has the floor affects not only the speaker but those trying to listen to the speech.

Yelling, interrupting and pacing is rude.

If you are there to hear what the person has to say, then listen.

If you are there looking for confrontation, do it in a different arena, not an organized lecture set up to serve the public.

If you are bored or distracted, don't go, or at least for the benefit of those who aren't, sit quietly and sit still.

It's called respect and common courtesy.

Living the French way

Communicating abroad proves to be a never-ending struggle the French way. If I could argue with the women who work at "Prefecture," perhaps then I would enjoy the shuffling of more papers, the bureaucracy, and perhaps then I would "acquiesce" to the French way.

I find myself resisting the mode and mood of France. I even inhibited myself from delivering a small kiss to a French boy who had already learned to make "un coup de dragueur." I regret this now.

"In the dark we are all the same." I plucked this phrase from a student and included it in a column a year or two ago. Now, I am living with this commonality of alienation. I live among students from Norway, Sweden, Iceland, Finland, Australia, England, Japan, Poland, Germany, Turkey, Spain, Denmark and the United States. Luckily, in the darkness, we are able to express our differences. We reach out to one another for warmth. It's so unusual how much time we spend developing our friendships.

But what am I learning from this exile? That beauty on the exterior is enough sustenance for an entire culture. That a little wine every day may be enough medicine to help soothe my fear of speech, my fear of imperfect

French. That the one common denominator among all the international students is the English language. If we were required to speak in French to each other, we would know each others' names, countries, favorite sports, movies and food, but we would not know the secrets of the interior — what's most beautiful and unique about us all.

Last night I spent an unusual amount of time petting a dog. It was nice to communicate no matter how passé and simple the interaction. His leg twitched, and I couldn't get enough of his gratitude. Maybe that's the key to the French cultural phenomenon of "merde" on the streets. The French express their human need for companionship by carrying their pets with them everywhere. Today, as a dog cleaned the breadcrumbs from the floor beneath me, I didn't mind as I was cleaning the breadcrumbs from my own plate.

I never thought communicating could be such a frightening task. I never thought comprehending would be such an exhausting chore. I don't doodle on my notebook here. I have to stare at the teacher's mouth for fear of drowning in ignorance. I stare just like that dog, who, after receiving my attention, pranced out the door like a proprietor and watched the mechanical devices speed down the street. He looked out at a foreign land.

And thus, as I write this, I'm putting the puzzle together.

Comprehension seems to have many clues from sources as simple as graffiti. "Black Flag," "Anarchism," and "De l'argent pour les fecs, pas pour l'armée." (Money for the schools, not for the armed.) All these spot the walls of the halls, lecture rooms, bathrooms. But the radical nature of this university seems to be hidden except for the graffiti, which serve as road signs for the lost. I would like to be able to speak fluently so as to discover the underground churnings of thought. I miss such political musings.

But most illuminating for me was a short message written on a postcard by a French friend. The postcard showed a small boy, gritting his teeth, head drooped over the desk, a zombie-like look in his eyes. But the school setting did not restrict the possibilities for interpretation of his message on back: "Like the child, it's so hard to learn ... sn't it?"

I believe he was speaking about more than the learning within school or the learning of a language, but about the life-learning that alienation and cultural exchange can bring.

I hope when I write again my voice has matured, that I have grown from the child on the postcard into a woman.

JANA LEEP

GUEST

Jana Leep, K-State senior in psychology, is currently studying French at the University of Caen in Caen, France. Caen is a city in the Normandy province.

If only there could be interesting people living across the way from my window. If only they could be watching me watch for them, then I could be authentically living the French way.

It's not derogatory to say the French live for the daily performances that accompany simple transactions and interactions. If I could carry "Une baguette" under my arm, waiting to break off the end for the nightly ritual, perhaps then I could say I was living

HOW SELFISH ARE YOU?

Bone marrow drive needs volunteers

STEFFANY CARREL

George Carlin came to town Friday night.

He was his usual hilariously biting self.

Carlin just has this way of stripping away all the crap to get right down to the naked truth.

One of the naked truths he brought up Friday night involved being selfish.

Now, I know that most Americans will vehemently deny ever even entertaining a selfish thought. But face it folks — we're one selfish lot.

When was the last time you gave to the homeless? Or how about AIDS research? And how many of you have even considered filling out the organ donation info on the back of your driver's license, much less actually doing it?

I'm guilty, too, and actually rather creative at dodging any really selfish act. My excuse has always been that I couldn't find a pen that wouldn't rub off the plastic covering of my license.

But every once in a while something comes up that changes my normally self-involved life.

The most recent something that really got me concerned is a little boy in Denver.

He's nine years old.

He should be thinking about Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles and baseball.

Instead, he has to have a blood transfusion every five days just to stay alive.

He's sick with leukemia, and in order to live he has to have a bone marrow transplant. Of course, there are no guarantees, but the transplant is very likely his only chance to see his 10th birthday.

The saddest part is that a donor was found, supposedly a "perfect match." But the donor backed out. And now this little boy is living each day knowing it may be his last.

Some people say they can understand and the "perfect match" has the right to back out.

Well, I say that somebody better explain that one to me.

The right?

If you knew that you were the one person in the world who could save another person's life, how could you possibly back out? How could you possibly turn away?

If that's not selfish, then somebody better damn well rewrite the definition of the word.

As you can tell, I've become seriously and emotionally involved here. And I've been telling all of my friends to go to the Bone Marrow Drive Nov. 12. It's an opportunity for all of us to be a little less selfish.

The Drive is 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. that Tuesday in the Union Ballroom.

It will take you just 15 minutes to fill out a health history form and have them take about two tablespoons of your blood.

From there, you will be registered as a possible donor in the National Bone Marrow Computer Bank.

If there is a preliminary match, you will be contacted. Another sample of blood will be requested, and you will be counseled about the actual procedure of donating your bone marrow.

In the event that you are a "match," all medical and traveling expenses are paid.

The risks to the donor are those involved when going under general anesthesia.

My biggest argument is "Why not?"

Why wouldn't everyone want to at least try to help?

Maybe you're that one special person in the world who could save that little boy's life. Or any other little boy. Or any other person at all.

Just go next Tuesday and try.

And maybe you'll be lucky enough to save a person's life.

LETTERS

Wefald deserves a bread today

Editor:

In response to the editorial in the Oct. 24 Collegian titled "Just giving credit where credit is due," I have to say "Get off President Jon Wefald's back!"

First and foremost, President Wefald deserves our applause for helping to attract the kind of students who will take K-State to new heights of academic achievement, and the success of our debate team is evidence of his resolve.

Second, it is my understanding that the president of the University is not directly responsible for the financial condition of the athletic department. That responsibility rests with the athletic director, and I feel K-State athletics are on the right track. By the way, we do not have a "debt-ridden football program," as the anonymous editor writes; the whole department is in the red.

Third, as for President Wefald's participation in bringing Playboy magazine to K-State and "helping K-State become one of the nation's top T&A schools," I suspect he had little to do with it.

Now, if President Wefald played a role in bringing the American Gladiators to K-State, I think that's great. Not only does it put people in the stands at Bramlage Coliseum, helping pump funds into the school's coffers, but having pictures of our campus shown on national television can only have a positive effect. This is a beautiful place, in case you haven't noticed, and the show may help attract some students.

In conclusion, I would like to personally thank President Wefald for his contributions to K-State and let him know there are some of us who appreciate what he is doing.

As for the writer of the editorial, who chooses to hide behind the cloak of the Collegian's Opinion Page, I recommend a change of schools. Do us all a favor and move to Lawrence where your self-righteous attitude will be appreciated.

Kudos to custodians

Editor,

I wish to commend the custodial staff employed at K-State, particularly that at Farrell Library.

In this era of scandals, fraud, malfeasance and/or fault-finding, it is refreshing to observe dedicated, reliable and responsible individuals who maintain high standards and provide working environments of sanitation and comfort for those who use this facility.

Three cheers for the custodians at K-State.

LETTERS

History important to understand conflict

Editor,

This letter is in response to the Oct. 24 editorial on peace in the Middle East. I must say the writer's optimistic view is great, but I feel I need to clarify a few statements.

The first concerns religion in Israel and the "battle of faith," as the writer put it. Israel is a political state made up of a greatly diverse people. But, while there may be many Christians living in Israel, the battle is not theirs. The controlling power in Israel is Jewish. Israel was conceived as a Jewish state. Islam is not fighting against Christians for any claim on the Holy Land. They are fighting with Israelis, and in some sects of Islam, Jews in general.

The second point is there is good reason for both Israelis and Arab people to be apprehensive and pessimistic. This is not the first attempt by Israel to find a solution to the situation, and each failure has caused a steady increase in tension and violence on both sides.

This is a fight that goes back to Ishmael and Isaac in the Holy Scriptures in our mutual history.

I must agree with the writer in saying I can only pray both sides come to this conference with open minds and peace at the root of their hearts, as is fitting of any cousins.

America losing to liberalism

Editor,

I am writing in response to Jason Hamilton's Oct. 29 column. I respect Mr. Hamilton's witness to the fact that our country is being run by individuals lacking ethics and morals. But his article raises only the morals of Republican leaders whose primary motivations were the safeguard of our country.

In his analysis, Hamilton evidently overlooked a few of his friends. The entire Kennedy clan, beginning with Daddy Joe's bootlegging during prohibition to John and Robert's sharing of Marilyn Monroe, and Edward's alcoholism, womanizing and tergiversation of Chappaquiddick (not to mention being expelled from a university for having another student take a Spanish exam in his place) was simply disregarded.

Other interesting cases include former Speaker of the House Jim Wright, Sens. Metzenbaum, Cranston and Biden, and Franklin Roosevelt.

That's right. Former President Roosevelt, father of all liberals, authorized covert operations that sent American pilots (the Flying Tigers) to help China fight Japan illegally before the United States was officially involved in World War II.

This country's ethics are steadily declining and have been for a long time. With the liberals' demands for sexual, bodily and criminal freedoms, not to mention their fictitious "separation of church and state," American values continue to fall.

One day, liberalism will have gone the way of the dodo, and our country will once again be "one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

New dental plan for employees

State workers receive freedom of choice in coverage

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

A new dental insurance plan will allow employees of the state of Kansas to choose a dental plan that will suit them the best.

The new "freedom of choice" dental plan will take effect Jan. 1, 1992, and will be provided by Prudential Insurance.

The plan will allow employees to choose between a traditional plan or a Dental Maintenance Organization (DMO).

Jennifer Gehrt, University benefits counseling manager, said all K-State employees will be placed in the traditional plan at the first of the new year.

"Everyone will automatically be transferred to the traditional plan," Gehrt said, "and if the employee wants to be in the DMO, he or she can transfer over to it."

State Health Benefits Administrator Dave Charay said the main reason for the switch from the current dental insurance provider to Prudential was to increase benefits to employees at no additional rate increase.

Charay said aside from an increase in coverage, the main benefit of the new Prudential dental plan comes from the DMO plan.

Under the DMO plan, Charay said, Prudential will cover 100 percent for preventive dental care, such as annual checkups and cleaning.

"We are big advocates of preventive care, and this is the first time we have been able to get preventive dental care at no cost," Charay said.

Charay said the DMO plan will also cover 80 percent of basic care and 50 percent of major dental work.

Currently, there are no Prudential DMO providers in Manhattan. Sager Dental Associates, P.A., used to provide DMO coverage from Prudential but withdrew from the program in October.

The Sager office had no comment on why it would no longer provide DMO coverage from Prudential.

Mary Osborne, Prudential director of dental operations, said the company is still talking with Manhattan dentists and hopes to recruit some before Jan. 1.

Charay said if there should happen to be no dentists providing DMO coverage in Manhattan, employees will still be covered by the traditional plan Prudential provides.

He said the traditional plan is better than the current plan provided by Blue Cross and Blue Shield, which covers 50 percent for preventive, basic and major dental work.

Under the traditional plan, Charay said, Prudential will cover 60 percent for preventive care, 60 percent for basic care and 50 percent major dental work.

would be itching and bumps that occur on or around the penis, scrotum or anus. On the woman, symptoms would occur on or around the labia, cervix or anus.

In most cases, warts are not visible to the naked eye. In other cases, they may look like small, hard spots or take on a fleshy, cauliflower-like appearance.

"This disease is only skin deep," Moeller said. "It doesn't spread to the lungs, heart or anything else."

The majority of experts believe that HPV is not eliminated from the body, but can be controlled by the immune system, he said.

Moeller said 80 to 90 percent of cervical cancer is known to be caused by HPV, and there may possibly be a relationship between HPV and scrotum cancer, which has not yet been proven.

Treatment for HPV for women is through cryotherapy, freezing of the cervix, which destroys the tissue that is abnormal. Surgical removal and several other techniques are used to treat men.

"There is no proof of an actual cure," Moeller said. "It's not a one-time treatment. It is done in intervals and may take up to a couple of years to be rid of the abnormal tissue."

Moeller said warts are detected in women through a pap smear, and sometimes it takes five to 30 years to detect, so pap smears are important. Warts on males are slightly easier to detect.

According to the American College Health Association, abstinence is the surest way to avoid infection. Condoms are always encouraged, but that does not guarantee 100-percent effective prevention.

"HPV is more common than any other sexual diseases," Moeller said. "It keeps us very busy."

"What's so scary is how common it is," Davis said. "One out of every two people have HPV, and not one area of the States is singled out. College campuses everywhere are trying to deal with this epidemic."

Lafene also treats cases of other sexually transmitted diseases.

Lafene not filing insurance claims

Cost, labor, paperwork not justification for continuing to file prescriptions

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

Students interested in getting money back on prescriptions purchased at Lafene Health Center have to file the claims with insurance companies themselves.

On Aug. 1, 1990, Lafene stopped filing insurance claims on prescriptions for their patients. The money received from the insurance by patients didn't justify the paperwork, labor and cost that went into the system. Lafene Director Lannie Zweimiller said the center was just like any other business, and it has to try to be as cost efficient as possible.

Medication prices at Lafene are very low, he said. Before, there were a lot of claims to file for $2-$3 prescriptions, and the money reimbursed to the students didn't equate to the clerks' time and the overall cost to file.

"If we started to file insurance claims for prescriptions again, the cost would get passed down to the students," he said. "The cost of the medication would ultimately go up."

Zweimiller said all the information for filing insurance for prescriptions is given to students, and they can decide from there whether to file.

"We lose some good will and patient happiness, but in the end, the benefits are greater for Lafene and the students," he said.

Insurance Clerk Judy Pinnick said processing the claims caused a lot of wasted time and energy because only after some claims were filed did clerks learn that some insurance companies don't cover prescriptions.

"It was quite a service we were providing. However, it was neither beneficial for Lafene or the students," she said.

Pinnick said the center does a lot to assist students otherwise.

"We send in insurance for any of our other services, such as X-rays, to the company of one's choice," she said.

Brad Clem, junior in civil engineering, said the price of the prescriptions at Lafene is very reasonable.

"I don't see why anyone would mind filing their own insurance claims," he said.

Program to inspire artists expanding

Professor, student work closely together producing project

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

After two and a half years of existence, the Konza Prairie Artists' Project is expanding.

The program was originally designed to inspire artists at K-State on future artwork. Since then, the program has doubled in funding, artists and students, allowing for more programs to develop.

Gary Woodward, head of the art department, said that the programs have proven to be very beneficial for both the faculty and students.

Woodward developed an idea a year and a half ago for the art faculty and students to go outside the University to get ideas for artwork. In doing this, various programs have evolved.

The Master Apprentice Project provides $1,000, which is to be divided between Teresa Schmidt, professor of art, and Annette Ferlet, senior in art.

They will work together on an art piece of their choice for one year. The money is used for any art materials that are needed.

"I think I'll learn a lot from Teresa and hopefully be able to integrate it into my work and become better at what I do," Ferlet said.

"It's such a wonderful experience for a teacher and a student to be able to work so close together," Woodward said.

The second program is called the Konza Prairie Artists' Project. Roger Routson and Edward Sturr, professors of art, were selected and will be given one year to complete a piece of art inspired by the tallgrass prairie.

Both faculty members are given $500 apiece for art materials.

"Revenue for two of the projects are from external sources," he said. "It's not too often that an art department gets that kind of recognition."

Woodward said two of the programs will be merging this year.

Robert Hower, professor of art, and Craig Goodman, sophomore in art, will work together on a Konza Prairie Artists' Project. Again, they will be given one year to work and $1,500 to divide evenly for materials.

Hower said that the normal student-teacher relationship is drastically changed.

"It's a pure learning experience," he said. "It gives me the opportunity to share with a student how I work. We both grow quite a bit."

Woodward said it's quite unique, especially the Konza Prairie site being used to create a body of work.

The K-State art faculty and students use the world's largest tallgrass prairie as an inspirational source to create visual art.

The artists' work varies in style, format, and material, but is focused on this unique, natural setting.

A second phase of the project is underway to expand the visual arts aspect of the Konza experience. The expanded Konza Prairie Artists' Project brings faculty and student artists from all parts of the United States and beyond to visit K-State and study on the Konza Prairie.

The Konza Prairie Research Natural Area is a Nature Conservancy property managed by K-State.

It is the location for a large number of research projects by naturalists and scientists. The prairie consists of more than 8,000 acres of largely undisturbed tallgrass and is still considered the largest and most pristine in the world.

KU routs volleyball team

Spikers fall in 4 game match to rival HawksFRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It was a typical match between two old foes.

K-State fell to KU in four games Wednesday night — 15-8, 15-4, 14-16 and 15-5—in the Wildcats' attempt to impede the Jayhawks' way to the Big Eight Tournament.

K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer failed to reappear following the contest for a meeting with the media.

The teams had to wait before they could transfer their pregame plans into action. Because of the weather conditions, the referees arrived late, and the match finally started after a delay of 23 minutes.

The Jayhawks took the first lead at 1-0, but K-State showed that the late start didn't cool off the team.

In the following minutes, both teams tried to get the upper hand in the first set. KU scored on short services while the Wildcats took advantage of setter Wendy Garrett's surprising trio of dinks.

But neither team could gain more than a one-point lead and the contest was tied at 8-8.

From then on, however, only one team scored — KU. A lack of concentration on the part of the Cats' helped KU to rally for seven unanswered points to close the set.

The second game was all KU. The Hawks weren't earning many points on their own, but were thriving because of K-State's offensive inefficiency. K-State's team hitting percentage of .000 told the story of the second set. Despite middleblocker Angie McKee's three points near the end of the set, the Jayhawks won the set easily 15-4.

After an intense talk during the break, the Cats came out like a different team.

K-State opened the third game with a service ace by junior Alison Mott. The Cats ran to a 6-0 lead and continued to expand the lead, forcing KU coach Frankie Albitz to call two time outs. Captain Kathy Saxton led the team with six kills and an ace during an 8-2 run that stretched the lead to 12-3.

The next minutes were almost a copy of K-State's last home game against the Oklahoma Sooners. The spikers were too confident with the lead, giving the Jayhawks the opportunity to come back into the third game. The Jayhawks caught up point-by-point, supported by the errors of the K-State players.

Garrett set a couple of balls out of reach for outside hitters Stephanie Liester and Rhonda Hughes. Even Hagemeyer's effort to break KU's streak by taking two time outs didn't help. The Jayhawks came back to tie K-State at 12. Just moments later, KU served for the match. But the Cats stayed alive warding off KU's effort to close the match.

One more time the Cats fought back. At 14-14, it was middleblocker Sarah Hoppel who came back onto the court to save the set for the spikers with a block and a tip-over in the final two plays. At the end of the third game, both teams pushed each other to a high level of volleyball. K-State continued to play at that level in the opening Live competition is the next step for Coach Dana Altman and the K-State basketball team as it seeks to mold individual talents into a cohesive unit.

A game with the Ukraine National Team will provide the setting for the Wildcats to test their development. Tonight's matchup in Bramlage Coliseum will provide a look at areas and skills that are not easily judged in practice, Altman said.

"We have a long way to go," Altman said. "We're very pleased with the effort the guys have put forward, but it's a long process, and we're not nearly ready to play a game."

The Ukraine Nationals are currently on a 14-game tour of the United States.

They were 2-2 on their trip heading into a game Wednesday at Emporia State.

K-State, meanwhile, has concentrated primarily on defense and rebounding fundamentals since practice began Oct. 15. Practice has given a somewhat inconclusive look at the development of newcomers, Altman said.

"We're just ready to get out and play somebody different," Altman said. "It's hard playing against yourselves day in and day out. Guys know what to expect, and nothing is quite like it is in a game."

Altman said progress has been slow because of the number of newcomers learning the system. Eight members of the squad are new this season. Two others, Deryl Cunningham and Hamilton Strickland, redshirted last season and have never played a game for the Wildcats.

That inexperience has been a major concern for Altman.

"It's been up and down so far," Altman said of the team's preseason practices. "These new guys give us a lot of physical ability that we haven't had, but they're just learning the way we want them to do things in our program."

"They're starting to come along, but it's going to take some time. It's a slow process and we've just got to be patient and continue to work hard."

The Wildcats' four seniors have provided valuable leadership in practice, Altman said, and will be helpful as the newcomers adjust to the Big Eight.

He will take a particular interest in the health of guards Gaylon Nickerson and Askia Jones. Nickerson will be testing a sprained ankle that has slowed his progress at the point guard position for which he is slated. Altman said Nickerson will probably not be in top form for the contest.

The exhibition game is the next of several steps Jones has made in returning from a broken ankle he suffered two summers ago. Altman said Jones' progress has been encouraging and looks for the sophomore to see a sufficient amount of playing time.

"We're going to put a lot of players on the floor and play a lot of different combinations," Altman said. "We're not sure who will start, but it doesn't mean a lot at this point. This is without a doubt a very important opportunity for each player to step forward and show something."

Altman said the coaches will be particularly interested in the performance of each individual at the de-

Houston rookie named N.L.'s best by baseball writers

By the Associated Press

Houston first baseman Jeff Bagwell, a non-roster invitee to spring training, was selected the National League Rookie of the Year on Wednesday.

Bagwell led NL rookies with a .295 average, 163 hits, 15 home runs, 26 doubles and 86 RBIs. He beat out Pittsburgh first baseman Orlando Merced in balloting by the Baseball Writers Association of America by receiving 23 of a possible 24 first-place votes and finishing with 118 points.

"I never thought I'd do that well," said Bagwell, who moved from Class AA to the major leagues. "I got lucky. I got a chance to play, and that was the main thing. After you get the chance, you've got to do well."

Bagwell set about doing well from spring training when he challenged Ken Caminiti for the third base position. When Caminiti kept his job, Bagwell thought he was headed back to the minors.

"I thought I was going to Triple-A but (assistant GM) Bob Watson asked me if I wanted to play first base," Bagwell said. "My answer was obvious."

Although he'd been a third baseman throughout his minor league career in the Boston organization, Bagwell adjusted to his new role quickly and improved his hitting after a slow start.

"He handles first base as well as anyone we've had over here," general manager Bill Wood said. "When we got Jeff, we knew he was a top prospect and rated well offensively."

By the end of the season, he was getting rave reviews for his defense, too.

"I'd love to play first base the rest of my life," Bagwell said. "I'm not an ideal first baseman. I don't hit for much power and I'm small, but I'll tell you, I love playing there."

Merced, who hit .275 with 10 homers and 50 RBIs, received 53 points followed by outfielder Ray Lankford of St. Louis with 28. Atlanta first baseman Brian Hunter was fourth with seven points.

Bagwell's .295 average led the Astros and his 163 hits were second to center fielder Steve Finley's 170. His 82 RBIs also were a team high and he hit one of the longest home runs of the season.

On May 5 at Pittsburgh's Three Rivers Stadium, Bagwell hit a ball five rows deep into the upper deck in left field — an estimated 456 feet.

The Astros obtained Bagwell from the Red Sox on Aug. 31, 1990 for reliever Larry Andersen, who left Boston to sign as a free agent with San Diego. Bagwell played for Boston's Class AA team at New Britain in 1990 and earned Eastern League MVP honors.

Making the jump to the majors leagues caused Bagwell some early season sleepless nights.

Palermo returns to Dallas to begin testimony in case

By the Associated Press

DALLAS — American League umpire Steve Palermo detailed for jurors in dramatic and emotional testimony Wednesday how he was shot aiding two waitresses who were attacked by purse-snatchers.

Palermo returned to Dallas, where he underwent rehabilitation earlier, to testify in the aggravated robbery trial of Army Pvt. Kevin Bivins, one of four suspects in the July 7 incident.

"One of them reached and pulled something out and I hollered ... and then — pow, pow, pow, pow, pow," said Palermo, who struck the witness stand to mimic the sound of bullets. "Five shots rang out."

Palermo was eating dinner at Campisi's Egyptian Restaurant after umpiring a Texas Rangers game when waitresses outside the establishment were attacked by robbers. Palermo, former Southern Methodist football player Terence Mann and restaurant employees ran to help them. Both Mann and Palermo were shot.

Mann, 27, was shot in the neck, arm and abdomen. Palermo, 41, was shot in the back, and the bullet — which entered the right side of his back and exited the left — traumatized his spinal cord and forced Palermo to rely on leg braces and canes to walk.

Palermo recently returned to his Overland Park home after months of rehabilitation in Dallas.

"My life is a living hell," Palermo said, his eyes brimming with tears. "Ordinary things we all do as human beings — and I know I took for granted — I no longer take for granted: to go to the bathroom, to brush your teeth, to take a shower."

Bivins faces up to life in prison and a $10,000 fine on the aggravated robbery charge.

The women's tennis team experienced a few ups and downs Wednesday, which was the opening day of the Rolex Regional Championships in Omaha, Neb.

"The first day is always a long day of tennis," said Coach Steve Bietau. "Overall, I'm pleased with the way it has gone, and I'm particularly happy with the play of Suzanne Sim."

"She was able to take hold of a match and win it by playing aggressively when under pressure."

In singles action, Sim defeated Alex Kappel of Northern Arizona, 7-5, 1-6, 6-4. As of press time, Sim had not completed playing Sally Godman of Oklahoma State.

Karin Lusnic defeated Casey Cooley of Kansas, 6-1, 6-1. Sarah Brooks lost to Lisa Salvatierra of Utah, 6-4, 6-2.

In the consolation bracket of the singles competition, Neili Wilcox lost to Sarah Mugnaini of BYU, 6-2, 6-4. Mareke Plocher defeated Valerie Graves of Creighton, 6-0, 6-0. Martine Shrubsole lost to Alex Lasuda of Oklahoma State.

Michele Riniker, during the day, won two matches, defeating Annissa Robinson of BYU, 6-3, 6-2, and Jacki Gunthorp of Oklahoma State, 6-0, 6-3.

In doubles action, Riniker and Wilcox defeated Gonzalez and Abram of Southwest Missouri State, 6-2, 6-3. At press time, other doubles action was still underway.

The tournament will conclude Saturday.

Royals face choices

The next two-month stretch could be one of the most crucial periods in the history of the Royals' organization.

That sounds a bit funny considering that not even one pitch will be thrown in Royals Stadium over that period of time.

However, manager Hal McRae has been completely forward about the direction that he wants his team to take.

McRae is no dummy, and what's more, he has a memory. He remembers his days in the Kansas City lineup in the '70s and '80s.

He remembers the Royals as winners and the types of teams it took for them to win.

Those teams were a custom-made fit for spacious Royals Stadium and its artificial turf. The teams had speedy line drive hitters that could play defense.

They did it well enough to win one World Series ('85), one American League title ('80) and four additional AL West championships ('76, '77, '78 and '84).

McRae vows to change KC back to the winning formula that it has strayed away from recently. That should mean a busy off-season for the Royals' front office.

The Royals have four free agents — Danny Tartabull, Jim Eisenreich, Kurt Stillwell and Steve Crawford — and rumors say none will be signed.

Tartabull has been a standout since his arrival in KC. Last year he climbed to a new level, finishing the season with a .315 average while contending for league highs in home runs and RBIs.

Tartabull's season last year has the league's mouth watering. The "Bull" wants to stay, but the Royals have become wary of high salaries.

If the Royals do plan to change their chemistry, it will take money to acquire talented players with the abilities that they want.

The other three free agents also would appear to be players the Royals should try to keep.

Eisenreich is a hard worker who gets the job done — just the kind of player the Royals had during the era that McRae is trying to reconstruct.

Stillwell is a top shortstop and one of the league's best young talents. McRae has feuded with him since his arrival, but it's difficult to see the Royals letting him get away for nothing.

Crawford, although not flashy, has been a consistent performer out of the bullpen since his acquisition in '89. He seems like someone the Royals would want to keep. Besides, his loss would be one more hole to fill, and the Royals need to use all of their transactions to mold their new image.

Who will be left out?

Todd Benzinger should be back at first base. He has been everything the Royals hoped for since he was picked up from the Reds last July.

Brian McRae will stay. He has all the tools the Royals want — speed, defense and hitting ability. Plus, his father's calling the shots.

Kirk Gibson or George Brett — won't happen. Brett is the Royals' heart and soul. Gibson is the only other veteran on the club. Plus, he gives the team a spark with his gutsy play and deceivable speed.

Gary Thurman is waiting in the wings behind Gibson in leftfield. He has as good of speed as anyone on the team. Unknown to the casual observer is the fact that Thurman is gradually muscling up and beginning to show some pop in his bat.

Kevin Seitzer — maybe. He, like Stillwell, was ousted from the lineup. Yet, no one works harder than Seitzer. He has talent and hates to lose. McRae knows this and it's what he is looking for. Don't be surprised if he's back in blue come April. Yet, is Seitzer the player that hit over .300 in '86-'88 or the one that has steadily dropped since?

Terry Shumpert? He is one of the more athletic second basemen in the majors. The Royals can't increase their speed or defense much at this position. Pencil in Shumpert for the

"It was a close call," McClaskey said. "I felt like I was on a roller coaster. One minute, I thought I had a good chance, and the next minute, I didn't know. We've got a tougher week ahead than we can imagine," McClaskey said.

She said she wasn't referring to the vote's margin, but rather to the task of trying to get students to the polls for the run-off.

"A lot of people came to the polls concerned about the referendums, but not too well informed about the presidential candidates," she said.

Wingert told his supporters they had a lot of work to do in the upcoming week.

"It's not time to let up," he said. "But we have time to celebrate now."

Wingert said he plans to continue doing the same type of things he has been doing to get ready for the run-off.

"We're going to hit as many living groups and campus organizations as we can," he said. Wingert said he has visited about 100 groups during his campaign.

Knowing now that she has the chance, McClaskey said there is plenty of work to do before the run-off.

"I need to keep the support I got from the voters these two days and get out and reach the people I haven't reached yet," she said.

McClaskey said she would tell students wanting to know why they should vote for her about her greater experience at the University.

"I will have completed seven semesters here after this semester," she said. "From serving as a freshman on committees to being president of Blue Key Honorary this year, I've experienced almost all the steps college life has to offer."

Wingert said listening to his voters is the key to his campaign.

"What I hear most often is students want a student body president that will go back and listen to their concerns," he said. "Right now, I'm pretty well in touch with students and their thinking."

Another big winner this year was current Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt.

In addition to winning a graduate school senate seat, Heitschmidt was also the top vote-getter for the Board of Student Publications.

"I don't know what to say," Heitschmidt said. "I'm pleased."

Heitschmidt attributed some of his success to name recognition.

"I think that probably had a lot to do with it," he said. "I'm pretty pleased with the voter turnout. I think the referendum made a big difference with that, but that's what we like to see."

Heitschmidt said it was unusual for student body presidents to run for office after serving their term.

"Most presidents graduate after they finish up," he said. "But I'll be sticking around."

also. "I know there were many students wanting to use the Rec Center and there wasn't enough room to satisfy their needs, especially during the peak hours," Wefald said. "This vote will give the Rec Center the ability to meet the students' needs."

In the past, there was concern that the referendum process was too tough to pass. For a question to be approved when less than a third of the student body voted, a 60-percent approval was needed.

"Just looking at the 60-percent rule, this vote is incredible," Wefald said. "When you think that, in the entire history of the United States, only two presidents got over 60 percent of the vote, you begin to see just how hard it is to attain that level of approval."

"I think this speaks well of the focus students put on these two referendums."

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, agreed.

"I don't think there has been any referendum in the last 25 years that has rendered this much support," Bosco said. "For that matter, I doubt there have ever been two referendums pass so overwhelmingly."

Return

The base had changed since the war all that time ago, too. Some of the yellow ribbons that had decked the fences of the grade schools on Custer Hill had been tattered by the wind and weather and changing of the seasons. Some of them had been taken down. The post itself seemed less edgy, less worrier.

But about 250 people turned out for these soldiers' return. It was like old-home week for many.

"The last of the finest returns," yelled a man wearing a "Nuke Iraq" desert cap, holding an American flag in one hand and a POW-MIA flag in the other. He had been at almost every homecoming celebration for Fort Riley troops. He said he was damn proud.

But then McDaniel Rawlings heard his friends were ready. He got in formation. The doors were opened and a gust of cold wind blew in a few snowflakes.

And then the Fort Riley Band struck up again, one last time, as 190 tired, happy and teary-eyed, desert-fatigued soldiers from the 556th Maintenance Company returned home.

Memorial Hospital's new low-dose, film-screen mammography unit is designed and used exclusively for mammograms. Our service is professionally staffed by experienced radiologic technologists and it is fully accredited by the American College of Radiology.

One out of every nine women will develop breast cancer in her lifetime. The best defense and the key to surviving breast cancer is early detection. Mammograms done in conjunction with monthly breast self-examination (BSE) and annual exams by your doctor provide the most protection. What should you do?

- Practice breast self-examination monthly.
- Have a breast exam by your physician annually.
- When you reach the age of 35, ask your physician to schedule you for a baseline mammogram, and follow the American Cancer Society guidelines thereafter. Between the ages of 40 and 49, a mammogram should be done every one to two years, with a physical breast exam every year. After age 50, a mam-mogram and physical breast exam should be done every year.

'Flowers for Algernon' deserves a rose

Purple Masque production lives up to classic tale

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

Either "Flowers for Algernon" was performed badly the first time I saw it in high school, or this cast is a treat.

I'd venture to bet on the latter of assumptions. The K-State Theatre will perform the popular David Rogers' play at 8 p.m. today, Friday and Saturday at the Purple Masque Theatre. Go. It's excellent.

But let's continue for the sake of expansion.

The basic plot of the play, based on the Pulitzer Prize-winning novel by Daniel Keyes, centers around Charlie Gordon. Charlie, a mentally retarded man, is chosen to take part in a scientific experiment to increase his intelligence.

But Charlie discovers that the disappointments he experiences outweigh the positive results.

Director Fred Darkow, graduate student in speech, said the play's past success comes from the audience's ability to identify with the character of Charlie.

"We all want to be better than we are and what we do have. We don't want to lose," Darkow said.

The play centers on a variety of minor themes, he said, including the ethics of scientific testing, acceptance of fate and the way mentally retarded people are treated in society.

The classic script is backed by a fabulous cast.

The most obvious cheers go to Ross Rademacher, who plays Charlie Gordon. Rademacher has taken on the difficult role of a mentally retarded man, yet he is remarkably convincing. Often a role like this is overdone.

However, he not only executes speech patterns well, but he adds to the performance with excellent body language.

And to top it off, he's also a freshman.

Rademacher and sophomore Kristin Hobson, who plays Charlie's love interest, have added a fresh aspect to the production, Darkow said. They have put in extra effort to prove themselves. In doing so, they have sometimes challenged the older actors, he said.

Junior Ayne Steinkuehler also turns in an impressive performance as Scientist Nemur, who spearheads the experiment. Steinkuehler has excellent facial expressions and enunciation, which adds a special touch.

However, the show is nearly stolen by secondary cast members. The scenes in the New York bakery where Charlie works stand above the rest. Lisa Leilani Working, freshman, and junior Cory Hayes provide notable comedy relief from the otherwise sobering plot as store owner and worker.

In contrast, Hayes and Working juggle these roles with serious ones. Hayes plays young Charlie and Working is Charlie's mother. Both actors show obvious talent and depth in this performance.

Additional hats off go to costume designer Andrea Wood. While not elaborate, the costumes are precise and add to the believability of the show.

The Purple Masque lends a great sense of coziness to any production performed there. Its acoustics enable the audience to hear quiet lines.

Freezing affects feeding

Low temperatures force farmers to alter livestock foods

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Dropping temperatures have caused Kansas livestock producers to look at other feeding options.

Larry Corah, professor of animal sciences and industry, said whenever the temperature drops below 30 degrees or the ground is covered with snow, cattle feed has to be alternated.

"Hay and wheat middlings are being used as substitutes for grass, which provide them with a good energy source," Corah said.

Wheat middlings have become a more abundant source for livestock, he said. They are a by-product of the wheat milling process and a good protein source.

"Research from K-State and Oklahoma State University shows that when feeding a wheat middlings-based supplement, you should maintain the crude protein content at 20 percent or more to make the best use of a poor-quality food," said Dale Blasi, south central area Extension livestock specialist.

Blasi said when a livestock producer uses wheat middlings, the pelleted form is the most economical because the pellet is a more compact package to handle than a load of loose particles.

The typical nutrient content of pelleted middlings is 12 percent moisture, 15 percent crude protein, at least 9.5 percent crude fiber and 2.5 percent crude fat. Calcium, phosphorus and potassium levels each make up around 1 percent.

Blasi said wheat middlings are making up a higher percentage of bran than in years past because many flour mills are doing a much better job of extracting the endosperm and germ fractions of the grain, leaving the bran as the main portion of wheat middlings.

He said although wheat middlings can be a good supplement, cattle producers should carefully watch cost.

"One disheartening factor is the rapid daily increase in price per ton," Blasi said. "From Oct. 16 to 22, there was a price increase from $85 per ton to $97 per ton."

Mill operators blame the price increase on supply and demand.

Blasi also warns livestock producers to be aware of the specific components of wheat middlings because there can be varying amounts of heat, heat seed, broken berries and grain dust in the by-product.

moments of the final set. The team recorded three kills to build a three-point lead.

Being on the more relaxed side, the Jayhawks showed why they are still in the race for a place in the postseason tourney.

The Hawks showed strong team spirit to take over the control in the game. At the same time, the K-State spikers couldn't keep up the high level, falling back to a higher percentage of unforced mistakes.

With a renewed powerful offensive attack, KU posted 12 points in a row, leaving K-State playing the role of spectator.

The Hawks improved with the win to 22-6 overall and 5-5 in Big Eight play, which will keep KU in a good position for reaching the tournament.

For the Cats, it was another step back to 10-17 and 1-9 in conference play.

Jurors angered over publication

Newspaper editorial results in harassing phone calls

By the Associated Press

GARDEN CITY—Some members of a jury that acquitted a man in a shooting case say they have been subjected to harassing telephone calls after their names were printed in the Garden City Telegram.

Some of the jurors say they were victims of racial harassment in some of the anonymous calls.

Telegram publisher Jim Bloom published the jurors' names in an editorial following the acquittal two weeks ago, saying he was outraged by the verdict.

In a column printed later, Bloom apologized for any racial divisiveness he may have caused in the community but said he still believed the jurors should explain their reasoning so any flaws in the legal system could be corrected.

The jury had found Richard Queener, 24, innocent of aggravated battery in the shooting of Chad Dew, 19. Dew, a member of the football team at Garden City Community College, was shot at an end-of-school party.

Queener had testified he merely had intended to scare Dew when he pointed a gun at him and did not intend to shoot him.

The jury apparently relied on a strict interpretation of the law that requires the prosecution to prove there was intent to injure the victim.

Dew was seriously injured and lost vision in one eye. He is in rehabilitation learning to walk and talk again.

The names of jurors have not been printed by newspapers since the 1950s, said Ron Keefover, a spokesman for the Kansas Supreme Court.

Bloom said in his column he felt he could print the names because jurors "lose their standing as private citizens and become public figures in relation to the case they hear."

Mike Macfarlane should return from knee ligament surgery. He was fast becoming the best hitting catcher in baseball and is solid at calling a game. His backups, Brent Mayne and Tim Spehr, leave K.C. strong at this position.

How do David Howard and Bill

Pecota fit into the equation? Pecota turned into a everyday player last season and has the ability to shift to short if McRae settles on Seitzer at third. Howard still needs some time to continue to develop but may get the nod if the Royals can't work a trade.

That leaves the left side of the infield and right field as question marks. Even those may not be, though, if a couple of relationships can mend this winter.

Magic Johnson tests positive for HIV, retires

'I will beat it, I'm going to have fun,' NBA great says

By the Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Magic Johnson, whose beaming smile and sparkling play entertained basketball fans for more than a decade, announced Thursday that he had tested positive for the virus which causes AIDS and is retiring.

"Because of the HIV virus I have attained, I will have to announce my retirement from the Lakers today," Johnson told reporters gathered at the Forum, where he played for 12 seasons with the Los Angeles Lakers.

"I plan on going on, living for a long time ... and going on with my life," he said. He added that he planned to become a spokesman for the HIV virus and would campaign for safe sex.

Both Johnson and the Lakers' physician, Dr. Michael Mellman, said he doesn't have AIDS, only the virus that leads to it.

"I feel really good," Johnson said. "I feel great."

Johnson didn't say how he contracted the virus, usually transmitted through sex or intravenous drug use. He referred questions about that to Mellman, who said, "I don't believe we know at this point, specifically."

Johnson repeatedly stressed that "safe sex is the way to go."

Johnson, 32, led the Lakers to five NBA championships. He is the most prominent American to announce his infection with human immuno-deficiency virus since Rock Hudson.

More than just a basketball star, Johnson has been a philanthropist, a prominent corporate spokesman and a role model for young people. His broad grin, familiar nickname and electrifying ability have made him familiar to people around the world.

Johnson came in fourth in a recent consumer survey of the appeal of athletes as commercial endorsers, ranked behind Michael Jordan, Bo Jackson and Tommy Lasorda. He has endorsed Converse athletic shoes, Johnson appeared nervous at the outset of his announcement, but later relaxed and smiled frequently.

"I'm going to go on, I'm going to beat it and I'm going to have fun," he said, displaying some of the irrepressible zest for life that he brought daily to the basketball court.

"What we have witnessed today is a courageous act by a very brave man," Mellman said. "He is not a person who is invisible, and because of his presence, because of his potential impact on society ... I think that he should not only be commended but held as a modern-day hero."

Johnson said he found out the final results of his HIV test on Wednesday. Mellman said Johnson was initially tested for an insurance policy.

Johnson, who was married two months ago, said his wife tested negative for HIV.

Johnson missed the Lakers' first three games this season because of what was described as the flu. On Monday, he was cleared to begin practicing.

Mellman said he recommended that Johnson not play professional basketball, or participate in the 1992 Olympics, because of the intense level of physical activity both would require. Johnson had been chosen for the U.S. Olympic squad that will play next summer in Madrid.

His retirement and news of his HIV infection came as a sharp blow to those who knew him, watched him

Store owner makes changes

In wake of Heintze murder, women won't work alone at remodeled Pate's

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The killing of K-State sophomore Catherine Heintze while she was working at a convenience store has prompted the storeowner to make some physical and operational changes.

Heintze was shot in the head during a Sept. 20 robbery attempt at Pate's Convenience Corner north of Junction City.

On Nov. 1, two Fort Riley soldiers, Jason Lee Turner and Nathaniel Wayne Ellibe, were arrested and charged in connection with the murder.

Storeowner Pate Willingham said he decided to change his hiring policy because of the situation.

"I will not hire women to open or close the place," he said. "I'm not going to put myself in the position of having ladies working by themselves. Maybe it could have prevented it, maybe not."

Willingham said there are no women currently employed at the store. He said he would consider hiring women, but they would never work alone.

"This time of year is kind of slow, so for the rest of the winter, it's just me and one other guy," he said. "This summer, I might hire a woman for part-time cash register help, but she'll work with a male."

After the Heintze murder, Willingham said he closed his store for three weeks to clean up and remodel.

"There are some security things, but, of course, I don't want to release those," he said. "I cleaned the store, painted the inside, moved some things around and tried to change the inside to give it a different appearance. I wanted it to not seem like the same place, for my benefit as well as anyone else's."

Willingham said he did not think the incident has affected business.

"It's the same amount of business for the season. It's pretty normal," he said.

Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said the frequency of officers patrolling the area around Pate's would continue to be the same.

"We've always been there. Our response time the night of the murder was less than two minutes after the alarm was triggered," he said. "Out of the business-type places located outside the city limits, he sees us more than anyone does."

President buys tickets for pair

'Well, it's the Wefalds,' says 'intimidated' usher

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

Two K-State students will be going to the Queensryche concert free of charge because of a misunderstanding in the seating arrangement last Friday at the George Carlin concert in Bramlage Coliseum.

Dee Warren, junior in graphic design, said he had bought six reserved-seating tickets a month before the concert but lost one of the seats to someone in President Jon Wefald's party of eight.

Warren said his seat was taken when he and his roommate Joe Hug got up to get something to drink.

He said a woman who was with the Wefald's moved his coat, which he had used to save the chair. Instead of confronting the woman, he said he notified the usher about the problem.

Hug, junior in mechanical engineering, said the usher checked the tickets, then called his supervisor to recheck them.

"The supervisor counted the seats twice to make sure we were in the right seats," Hug said, "and we were. It was like he was intimidated," he said. "He told us, 'Well it's the Wefalds.'"

Becky Montoya, Bramlage box office manager, said the problem happened as a result of an usher's mistake. "When he saw what had happened and saw the Wefalds were involved," she said, "he just added another chair in the aisle."

Wefald said he asked two different ushers if his group was in the right

Use of old tests questioned

Professor says test files not fair, a way of cheating

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

"Did you get the old test?" This crucial question is a familiar one for students before every exam. For some students, it's the only way they can pass a class, but for many teachers, it's cheating.

James Franke, associate professor of political science, said he does not approve of students using old tests from test files. He said he feels test files are not appropriate, because they are not accessible to all students.

Franke said he takes specific precautions to avoid students getting his tests out of the classroom. His method is to hand out only one test for each student. At the end of the exam, the students are required to hand in their test copy, answer sheet and student ID.

Although Franke's policy is strict, it hasn't always been effective. Franke said he remembers an incident when a student came into his class of about 250 students. After the exams were passed out, a student ran out the door. Despite efforts to chase the student down, she got away with the test.

Not all students agree with Franke that it is cheating to use an old test.

Jo Anne Payne, junior in interior design, said she sees no problem with using old tests to study.

"The old tests are helpful, because you know what to study for and have some idea of what the test form is going to be like," Payne said.

Payne also said she feels all students have equal access to test files. "People can go to the library or dorms to get old tests — not just fraternities and sororities," she said. "If a person really wants the old test, they surely know someone who has it."

Stephanie Hoelzel, junior in public relations, said students in greek houses definitely have better access to old tests than other students.

"People in greek houses have so many people in their houses who have taken classes and put their old tests on

Weather stalls removal of insecticide barrels

State approves plans; public safety department must wait

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

The weather is the last thing holding up the removal of the eight to 10 additional barrels believed to contain the insecticide DDT, from property just west of Manhattan.

The barrels were detected when soil samples removed from the site tested positive for DDT contamination.

"All we are waiting on now is the weather. We'll pick a day and if it's nice, we'll do it. If it's like (Thursday), we'll wait," said John Lambert, director of public safety.

The state approved several amendments to the original plans for removal over the phone on Tuesday, Nov. 5. "There may be a few changes made over the phone or in letters but basically we're set," Lambert said.

Two barrels were removed from the site last month, before a plan was submitted to the state.

The removal of the first two barrels cost about $12,000. The next eight to 10 are expected to cost less.

"We're already on third base with this," Lambert said. "All we have to do is gather the manpower and find a nice day."

Although some of the barrels are different colors, all are assumed to contain DDT.

"It's an expensive process to test to find out what a chemical is or isn't. If we assume what's in these barrels is unknown there are several hundred different things they would test for. That is a lot of money," Lambert said.

Year's last shuttle mission Nov. 19

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — NASA has set Nov. 19 as the launch date for the sixth and final space shuttle flight of 1991, a military mission by Atlantis.

Mission managers announced the date after meeting Thursday at Kennedy Space Center.

Atlantis is scheduled to lift off at 6:51 p.m. EST with six astronauts and a Defense Department satellite to be dispatched thousands of miles above Earth. The satellite is designed to warn of nuclear detonations and enemy missile launches.

After the satellite is released six hours into the flight, the astronauts will devote their time to military observations, radiation monitoring and medical experiments. The 10-day mission is supposed to end, if all goes well, Nov. 29 at Kennedy.

Everything about the flight, except for some military observation targets, will be unclassified. The crew will use special optics and communication equipment to evaluate the effectiveness of observing seaports, airports and other U.S. military installations from space.

"We have never really quantified per se the amount of detail we can see from 160 miles, 195 miles or 300 miles, wherever the shuttle might happen to be," astronaut Mario Runco Jr. said.

It will be the 10th trip into space for Atlantis and the 44th shuttle flight overall.

Multicultural crayons set to hit market

COLUMBIA, Md. (AP) — Students who want more realism in their coloring books can now buy a small set of "multicultural crayons," with colors to match skin complexions.

Six flesh-tone colors are included in new eight-crayon boxes being introduced Thursday by Binney & Smith, which makes Crayola crayons. The other colors, black and white, can be used for shading.

The colors are already available in Crayola's box of 64 colors, but most schools don't buy the larger box. The decision to sell the small sets comes after some prodding from a school supply company, Chaselle Inc.

The flesh-tone colors in the package are mahogany, peach, tan, sepia, burnt sienna and apricot. The "flesh" crayon was renamed "peach" in 1962 because it only applied to one of a multitude of skin colors.

Binney & Smith was to introduce the "Skin Tones of the World" assortment at a conference of the National Association for the Education of Young Children in Denver.

The traditional eight colors were orange, green, red, yellow, black, brown, blue and purple.

Chaselle is one of the top 10 school supply companies in the nation and one of Binney & Smith's largest educational buyers of crayons.

Rule: No water enters the Hoosier Dome

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — A prosecutor has dropped charges against a woman who tried to carry a cup of water into the Hoosier Dome. But he warned her: Don't do it again.

Only food or beverages provided by vendors are allowed in the stadium. "This dismissal is based solely on prosecutorial discretion," Prosecutor

Jeffrey Modisett said. "I believe that the tax dollars of Marion County are better spent on other cases, especially those involving violent crime, drugs and repeat offenders."

Barbara S. Myers-Kerns, 29, was charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest on Sept. 15 after a dispute with a security guard who stopped her from entering the stadium for the World Gymnastics Championships.

Police said she started yelling and screaming after being told she had to get rid of the water or be ejected. Police say she forcibly resisted arrest.

Modisett, in a letter dated Wednesday to the woman's attorney, said Myers-Kerns shouldn't view the dismissal of charges as a vindication.

But a conviction would have resulted in no more than a probationary sentence, he added.

Explosion rocks American University

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — A powerful explosion wrecked an administration building at the American University of Beirut before dawn Friday, but no one was hurt, police said.

The blast toppled in ruins the main tower of the building at the school, the Middle East's most prestigious university, which was founded by an American missionary 125 years ago.

A police spokesman said the explosion destroyed about half of the administration building, but no one was inside at the time. The spokesman can not be named under standing regulations.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the attack.

Budget amendment defeated

'Robbing Peter to pay Paul could be dangerous,' Batchman says

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer
BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

The $230,000 Educational Opportunity Funds budget was allocated for the 1993 fiscal year by Student Senate Thursday.

SENATE

The largest fiscal amendment proposed was for the Community Service Program. The amendment was to raise the community service program's budget from $7,750 to $15,000. The money would have been used to provide scholarships for students working in the Community Service Program during the summer. The amendment failed although it was brought up for reconsideration later in the meeting.

Darin Batchman, business senator, opposed allocating additional funds.

"This robbing of Peter to pay Paul could go on all night," he said. "It could set a dangerous precedent. The CSP will go on without this money."

Peter, in this instance, was the Career Planning and Placement Student Employment Service. Senate passed an amendment reducing their funds from $20,050 to $11,250.

Assistant Vice President for Personal Development Mike Lynch said, "The purpose of this service is to set up job placement to facilitate contacts between employers and students. Some students are borrowing themselves into oblivion but we would like see students who prefer to work than borrow."

"A cut in funds would simply reduce the breadth of the program. I'm not sure you could eliminate any one thing. It would just be less comprehensive," Lynch said.

Agriculture Senator Julie Martin expressed fears that, since this is the first year the program was funded, there is no guarantee of its success.

"Let's just have part of the program and see how it goes," she said. "If it does well, then they could get more money."

The most controversial proposal consisted of giving $400 leadership scholarships to the presidents of the Black Student Union, the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, the Asian-American student organization and the Native American student organization. The proposal failed almost unanimously.

"These are not scholarships, they are salaries. We would be paying these students to do what every organization's president already does," said Joel Gruenke, graduate senator. "If you want to give money to people qualified under the EOF guidelines, you should vote this amendment down and vote to give more money to scholarship funds."

The last changes to the budget were made Thursday night. Three groups were given increases in funds, while two received cuts.

The 1991 EOF Committee received numerous proposals for funding. But, because of limited resources, the committee recommended Senate to base its considerations on the following three basic guidelines.

Allocations may be made to support under-represented students in the form of a scholarship based on academic achievement, financial need and extra-curricular activities.

Money may be allocated for services such as tutoring and graduate assistants that enhance a student's educational experience.

Programs designed to eliminate obstacles that impede students from getting to the classroom or obtaining an education are also considered.

Other notable action taken by Senate was discussion concerning the suspension of the Student Senate Intern Program. At press time, no decision concerning the program's fate had been made.

KPERS officials face stricter rules

Subcommittee hopes to limit future losses

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state pension system could continue to make direct investments in private companies and real estate but only under strict conditions designed to reduce the risk, if recommendations of a legislative subcommittee are accepted.

Those conditions include cutting by more than half the amount of the $4 billion in assets of the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System that could be invested in direct placement and real estate loans, limiting individual investments to $5 million, and requiring at least two other investors in some projects.

The restrictions being recommended would limit to 10 percent, or about $400 million, the amount of KPERS money that could be invested in loans. The other approximately $3.6 billion would have to be invested in the traditional stocks, bonds and government securities.

KPERS launched six years ago a direct placement-real estate loan program that eventually saw more than $800 million invested. Because of shaky investments in companies that went bankrupt, known losses so far in the direct placement program are $110 million with another $162 million of investments impaired. Sizable additional losses are expected in the real estate program.

The recommendations were agreed upon Thursday by a subcommittee of the Joint Committee on KPERS Investment Practices, headed by Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence. Other subcommittee members are Sen. Marge Petty, D-Topeka, and Reps. Don Rezac, D-Emmett, Tim Carmody, R-Overland Park, and Bill Wisdom, D-Kansas City.

The entire joint committee, which has been investigating state pension fund losses for the past eight months, will consider the subcommittee's recommendations when it meets Nov. 21-22. If the full panel accepts them, they will go to the 1992 Legislature, convening Jan. 13.

Besides recommending the investment restrictions, the subcommittee suggested an overhaul of the KPERS Board of Trustees.

The present seven-member board would be abolished in January 1993 under the recommendation and replaced by a nine-member board.

The new board would include the state treasurer, two members elected by participants and retirees in the pension plan, four members appointed by the governor and one each appointed by the Senate president and House speaker.

The board members appointed by the legislative leaders and two of the appointees of the governor would have to have at least five years' experience in the investment business or be accountants, under the recommendation.

The subcommittee also recommended creation of a five-member investments advisory committee made up of pension fund experts to advise the KPERS Board of Trustees.

The goal of the subcommittee, Winter said, was to recommend changes in KPERS' investment policies so the massive losses of pension fund assets should never occur again.

"Direct placements as we've known them the last six years are dead," Winter said. "They can never happen again."

However, the subcommittee rejected an option of recommending that direct placement and real estate loans from the KPERS fund be prohibited.

"If you have no risk, you limit the fund's ability to make money for the retirement system," Carmody said. "You've got to strike a balance."

The issue of banning direct placement investments is far from settled, however. Some members of the full KPERS committee are known to strongly oppose letting them continue.

Rezac, vice chairman of the committee, said he supported restrictions, not a ban.

"I don't want KPERS loaning money to people my banker won't loan it to," he said.

Here are the restrictions recommended for KPERS' direct placement and real estate loan programs:

— Limit those investments to 10 percent of the entire KPERS asset fund, with 5 percent going to direct placement and 5 percent to real estate, or approximately $200 million each at present value of the fund.

— Require that half the direct placement money, or $100 million, be invested in A-rated or better investments.

— On riskier investments, or those rated less than A, limit KPERS' investment to $5 million.

School financing faces reform

Stephan says state can set minimum tax, redistribute money

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — A task force on Thursday pondered the possibility of the state making financial decisions for local school boards.

EDUCATION

The Governor's Task Force on Public School Financing began work that is supposed to lead to a plan for reforming the state's system for financing public school. It could meet into the weekend, and it is supposed to have a proposal for Gov. Joan Finney by Dec. 9.

Its members reviewed a non-binding legal opinion from Attorney General Bob Stephan in which Stephan said the state has the power to force school districts to set a minimum property tax levy and then redistribute the money among districts.

They also examined a report from a Kansas State official, David Thompson, who advocates that the state take a role in financing local districts' building and maintenance projects.

The task force is considering proposals to give the state more control over local property tax levies because of concerns about different districts' abilities to raise money from property taxes. Wealthier districts have an easier time of generating revenues.

"The general consensus that I hear is that the state is going to be assuming more of those local board roles," said the task force's chairman, Rep. Rick Bowden, D-Goddard, who also is chairman of the House Education Committee.

The task force's deliberations come in the wake of a 31-page ruling on Oct. 14 by Shawnee County District Judge Terry Bullock. Bullock said the state constitution requires the Legislature to provide an equal opportunity for a good education to all students.

The state currently spends $1 billion on education, about half of which is funneled through a complex formula designed to give poorer districts proportionately more money. School districts receive another $982 million from property tax revenues.

However, property tax levies vary widely because of differences in wealth among districts.

Total tax levies, covering general spending, building projects and payments on bonds for certain projects, range from 15.55 mills, or $93 for a $50,000 house, in Burlington, to 110.85 mills, or $665 for a $50,000 house, in Olathe.

The Wolf Creek nuclear power plant is located in Burlington, making it the wealthiest district in the state in terms of its assessed property valuation. That means a 1 mill property tax levy will raise much more money there than it will in other school districts.

Thus, the idea behind a statewide levy is to have some wealthy districts raise more money than they need through property taxes, then send the excess funds to the state for distribution to other, poorer districts.

Stephan's opinion said that the Legislature can do just that if it follows certain guidelines. For example, the law must say part of the purpose for property taxes is to raise money to be redistributed among districts for it to be valid.

Also, Stephan said, the Kansas Constitution prevents the Legislature from imposing a property tax levy that extends beyond two years. However, he said, lawmakers can simply renew the tax levy every year or two years.

"It can be done," said Rodney Bieker, chief counsel for the state Department of Education. "The wording has to be proper."

Dale Dennis, assistant superintendent of education, said the state would raise the same amount of money all school districts do together for their general spending by imposing a levy of 58.59 mills for all districts, or $352 for a $50,000 home.

Dennis also said the state could raise as much money for bond payments and capital improvement projects as all districts do combined with a uniform levy of 7.2 mills, or $43 for a $50,000 home.

The combined levy — 65.79 mills, or $395 for a $50,000 home, would be lower than the combined levy in 139 districts, including Wichita, Topeka, Olathe, Hutchinson, Lawrence and Salina.

Kansas State's Thompson, who is co-director of the Center for Education Finance, said the state has several options for helping school districts with capital improvement projects.

For example, it could assume the full cost of building and maintenance projects, or it could give grants or make loans to school districts. Currently, the state does not provide aid to districts for such projects.

OPINION

EDITORIALS

The war is over;
the soldiers remain

It was a cold November night one year ago today when the 1st Infantry Division got word it would be deployed to Saudi Arabia.

In the time that followed, the soldiers — unit by unit, truck by truck, one by one — loaded up in buses to head for Forbes Field in Topeka. From there, they flew to the desert.

Months later, we received word the war had started. The allies were bombing. For weeks, we sat in front of CNN and waited to see the latest reports.

The air strikes continued, and Democrats and Republicans in Washington, D.C., gathered to support the war. Businesses in Manhattan struggled to make ends meet. Some closed their doors.

In houses and apartments in Junction City, Manhattan, Fort Riley and everywhere in between, men and women cried in the night from worry about their wives and husbands, brothers and sisters, daughters and sons.

We soon heard about our friends who weren't coming back.

There was then the news that the ground war started. The Big Red One was rolling across the desert.

Four knotted days later, as Americans sat in front of TV screens, the nation was told the war was over.

The soldiers started coming back at the same time we heard that Kuwait was still burning. We thought then we might have to go back because the devil had the bomb.

But he backed down.

So the soldiers kept coming home to waves of yellow ribbons and cascades of cheers, whoops and yells. They kissed their wives, girlfriends, children and friends. Some of them kissed no one, but America was great again.

Some marriages, we heard not long afterwards, were crumbling. Some soldiers had trouble adjusting to family life. Others did just fine.

Now, we hear worries about crime rates and the overcrowding of a local army base. And we hear about a young girl who was shot in the back at a convenience store. We hear it's a few bad apples.

It's been a year, and the yellow ribbons aren't flying anymore. Many lives were lost, and many lives were changed. Hopefully, America won't forget.

Any other toxins we should know about?

What was the United States Forestry Service thinking about?

During the 1960s, burial was the proper means of disposing toxic chemicals. The U.S. Forestry Service was in charge of the dirty work.

OK, that was the thought process during the '60s. Soon, it was discovered burial was a bad idea, since the chemicals leaked into the water table. Such discoveries are expected by science.

But, when eight to 10 barrels of the insecticide DDT were found west of Manhattan this past week, we discovered just how organized the U.S. Forestry Service was.

When asked for the specifics about the barrels, the service was at a loss for words. Apparently, no record was kept of the burial, so no one was sure how many barrels there were at the site.

That sort of response doesn't go a long way toward making people feel secure from the dangers around them.

Just because something is considered safe does not mean records are not necessary. As harmless as DDT was considered in the '60s, it was still a toxic chemical. If something had happened to those barrels and all that DDT was unleashed at once, there could have been a major environmental catastrophe.

Unfortunately, it may be that nothing can be done to create a record of the lost chemicals of the '60s. But, in the meantime, the Forestry Service should take it upon itself to do whatever is necessary to find any other time bombs ticking away in our back yards.

Making the call

Candidates' photos chosen on basis of quality, contentCHRISTOPHER ASSAF
PHOTO EDITOR

It is not often an editor writes to readers about an article, photo, editorial or column that appeared in the Collegian. But because of the amount and magnitude of the reaction to the Jackie McClaskey photo on Thursday's front page, the editor and opinion page editor thought it was justified this time.

As photo editor of the Collegian, I am hired by the editor to give photographers assignments and choose which pictures run in the paper.

Every time I edit a photographer's film, I keep in mind the main points of the story the photo goes with, what the story-telling aspect of the picture is and if it is accurately matched with what is seen on the film.

With this in mind, I look for quality pictures to go in the Collegian. I look for technical quality, content, composition and emotion. These are the aspects the Collegian photographers and I have learned to look for, particularly in news situations. As photojournalists, we try to shoot good or great pictures.

Ultimately, the responsibility for the photos in the Collegian falls upon my shoulders.

McClaskey

Wednesday night, as has been done in years past, photographers were assigned to cover student body presidential candidates. Before they were sent out with reporters, the photographers were told to be in place when the candidates received the phone calls announcing which candidates made the run-off. They were told to get pictures of the candidates' reactions or celebration if they won. They were also on deadline. And from that point on, it was left to the photographers' abilities to capture the situation.

At the Collegian, we attempt to portray situations and events accurately for the reader, not deceive anyone and possibly lose the credibility our readers have in us.

But we cannot hide anything or fail to show it because someone may not approve. If that were the case, we would not photograph car wrecks, crime scenes, protests and goal posts coming down after K-

State beats KU.

I really doubt if the campus police were thrilled when they saw a front page, three-column photograph showing one of their officers hanging to a goal post for dear life as the fans carried it away. But we showed that police officer doing his job, which we respect and try to show whenever we can.

It's part of our job to depict for readers what public people do — good or bad. It is left to the reader to interpret a photo's content, but we do try to ensure the content be accurate to the situation. Sometimes it is an isolated moment that is captured, sometimes it is more general.

Last night, the two photographers with Fred Wingert and Jackie McClaskey came back and processed their film. When I edited, I decided we would run two pictures — both the same size — to keep things equal between the two candidates.

Wingert

I looked at the 25 or so frames of Wingert with the photographer, Shane Keyser, present. I then edited about the same amount of film of McClaskey with photographer Brian Kratzer. I was looking for moments that showed how both candidates felt when they found out they had made it to the run-off.

With Wingert it was not too difficult. It was not the same with the McClaskey photo.

I debated in my mind which photo of her to print. The one with her drinking a shot was a little out of focus and overexposed. The second choice was not as good, and she was not the dominant subject in the frame as Wingert was in the other picture.

I decided the photo of her drinking the shot was the best picture to depict the situation — her celebrating that she had been picked by the students.

Then, I left the photos on the editor's desk.

Later, as I was working on other pictures, Editor Greg Branson called me in to talk with him. Other staff members were present. He asked what my reasons were for running the photo.

He had some reservations about the photos putting McClaskey in a possibly negative light and Wingert in a potentially more positive one. I disagreed.

After a somewhat heated discussion, we decided the McClaskey photo showed her celebrating in a way — that in a college context — would not be construed as negative and we would leave it to the reader to decide. The candidates were aware the photographers were present, and we captured what happened in each individual situation.

LETTERS

Coverage of elections poor

Editor,

I cannot suppress my disgust for the Collegian's coverage of the student elections any longer. Running the picture of McClaskey drinking a shot at the party Wednesday was perhaps the most irresponsible journalism I have seen by the Collegian in my three years here.

Who knows what effect that picture will have on the election? Hopefully, it will not have any. But, it is possible that Jackie will lose support because the picture does not represent her as taking the office seriously. I suppose it could also help Jackie, because people will get out and vote for the person who was treated so unfairly by the Collegian. Portraying Jackie in such a light underneath the picture of the clean-cut Fred Wingert is entirely biased and unfair.

Another question arises about the column by Jason Hamilton run the first day of the elections. Even though the views were not that of the Collegian staff or Editorial Board, it was inappropriate to let Jason abuse his position as columnist and personally attack many of the candidates. Comparing Fred Wingert to Chuck Manson, Adolf Hitler and the like is completely uncalled for and unjustified.

I hope students will not let the Collegian's poor choice of photos and articles about the candidates influence their decisions, and they will vote for the candidate who they honestly believe will do the best job.

McClaskey photo
rotten choice

Editor,

Can we talk here? Where in the hell does the Collegian get off placing its obvious political biases on the front page of a paper that is an incredible influence on the student body and thus, the student voters of this campus.

The front page is not, if I may be so bold as to remind you, the Editorial page. I have a fantastically difficult time believing the Collegian would have the audacity to do such a thing. Are we, perhaps, rooting for Wingert and his staged political showing? What a winning smile, huh, Mom?

I'm quite brilliantly surprised that he's not holding a baby he stole off the street. Are we rooting for female candidate McClaskey who we shot shooting at the Outback? Is there perhaps some sort of editorial impression left on readers of the Collegian?

With just a glance at the front page, without even reading the article, we are given a distinct and overtly opinionated view of both remaining candidates. And, unsurprisingly, Jackie McClaskey, female candidate in the presidential race, is the one who is demoralized by your artistic photography.

If realism (which is completely acceptable, McClaskey) is your attempt then both candidates should be given a somewhat equal shot. We all know and can safely assume, that Winger merely waited till all photographers were out of range before he did his "celebrating."

Can we ask for some equality here? Especially in a day and age that women are fighting for it. Can we ask for some reporting here? Especially with your solid reputation. Can we ask for an apology here? You owe it.

Photo leaves biased impression

Editor,

I am writing in response to the front-page picture of Jackie McClaskey, student body president candidate.

How terribly sad it is that the students of the K-State campus could not have seen a live broadcast of the students, faculty and family members that turned out to support Jackie, or even one of the other pictures on the roll of film the Collegian photographer shot during his stay Tuesday evening.

Instead, the students caught a glimpse of a photo taken in the last 30 seconds Collegian representatives were in attendance.

I think the pictures of Jackie embracing her 4-year-old niece and two sisters would have been a nice touch to complement the photo above Jackie's. A headline could have read, "Candidate receives support from sister and niece who drove 210 miles in bad weather to hear results."

Another fitting piece of information could have been that the celebration with Jackie's sisters was also one for the victory of the library referendum, where one of them is employed. The only good point that can be proven from the photo is that Jackie has run an honest campaign from the beginning. She does not proclaim to be a martyr who will save the K-State campus, and she has not taken sole credit for the many projects she has been involved in to better the K-State campus during her years of involvement as a student.

I sincerely hope that the students of the campus are not offended by the picture like I was. However, do not lay the blame on Jackie. It is an unfortunate circumstance that the Collegian representatives chose to hover over Jackie and portray her gathering as a booze fest for the rest of the campus to see.

JARED GREGOIRE

In the beginning, there was darkness. Confusion.

And the darkness and confusion were upon the student, and he looked out and spoke thus, "Woe is me! What shall I ever do with my life? Where shall I go to procure gainful education in a world so demanding as this one?"

And he wandered through the dismal tumult of life, a soul bereft of direction, a vaporous apparition devoid of any sense of purposeful embodiment.

When all hope had seemingly vanished and the student beheld the infinite blackness of a life devoid of personal accomplishment, he thus sat down and waited for the end to rear its vile face.

But lo! For appeared before me were not the sinister faces of the furies of lifelong ignorance but the angelic countenances of those who sought to deliver me from my self-inflicted fate.

They spoke thus, their voices a deafening whisper throughout my head, "Thou shalt rise from your pits of despair, gaze thus upon your television and behold all your answers." Warily, I did so. And beheld him. David Letterman.

No, he was not to be my academic messiah. Rather, he would thus carry forth the answers I so desired, a receptacle of hope, the bearer of light into my infinite blackness.

And he would speak to me in the tongues of his Top 10 List.

I blinked, thinking perhaps the voices were the result of me having left too many of my groceries at the marketplace.

But lo! Brother Letterman began his oration thus, spouting hellfire and damnation at his little bald disciple and saying, "The top 10 reasons why thou shalt be an English major."

And thus my answer appeared. I would inundate myself in the peculiarities of the English language, and in the course of time I would pass this knowledge unto others.

My abysmal lack of direction was slowly vanishing, and thus I awaited my reasons for commencing my chosen academic course.

He began, and I listened.

Reason 10: Have desire to read "A & P" and "Araby" about 4,000 times apiece before I'm 23 years old.

Reason 9: Be able to insult people without them having any idea what I just said.

Reason 8: Want my students to call me "O Captain! My Captain!" just like in "Dead Poet's Society."

Reason 7: Chicks dig it.

Reason 6: Can always get my Pulitzer Prize by writing for the "National Enquirer."

Reason 5: Want to be famous and lauded only after I lead a life of poverty and die in some weird drowning accident.

Reason 4: Justifies my earrings, long hair and 98-pound body weight.

Reason 3: Cannot fake my way through a statistics problem like I can a thesis paper.

Reason 2: Find deeper meaning in bathroom wall literature.

Reason 1: Do better in "Shakespeare" category on "Jeopardy!"

And with these reasons I had my raison d'être, my recipe of essence, the final piece in what might have been a sadly incomplete puzzle. The chance to be whole again was easily within my grasp.

Thus Brother Letterman faded from my vision, but his words remained with me.

Years later, here I am. But, with the perseverance of time, it has been a matter of course in realizing there exist many more reasons for being an English major. I have found that the reasons, all of them, are my very own.

Like doing everything, the reasons these must do them must be thine very own.

Johnson changed NBA's image

Star's character makes him winner on, off court

By the Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — In his first professional basketball game, Magic Johnson leaped into teammate Kareem Abdul-Jabbar's arms like a joyful child just given a puppy.

From that moment on, Johnson's innocent, almost juvenile enthusiasm transformed the sport and transfixed millions of spectators worldwide. Even as he announced he was retiring from the game Thursday because he tested positive for the virus that causes AIDS, Johnson beamed and joked, smiling a mile wide.

When he came to the National Basketball Association in 1979 as a 20-year-old, the league was deflated. Attendance was stagnant, television viewers disinterested and the game dominated by talented yet humorless giants such as Moses Malone, Jack Sikma and George Gervin.

There was no spark. In that first game against the San Diego Clippers — which Abdul-Jabbar won at the buzzer with a desperate sky hook — Johnson's leap immediately gave the NBA the charisma it had never seen and so desperately needed.

It was clear, too, that Johnson's aptitude for basketball was nearly boundless. He dropped jaws, threading passes, spinning defenders and making the most difficult of shots.

The Lakers won five championships with him. His appeal reached far beyond Los Angeles. He was mobbed recently when the Lakers played in Paris, and children around the world wear T-shirts bearing his image.

Although a superstar, Johnson was the consummate team player. In the sixth game of the 1980 NBA Finals, with Abdul-Jabbar sidelined, Johnson as a rookie played all five positions on the floor, scoring 42 points, grabbing 15 rebounds and handing off seven assists.

The Lakers won that game, the title and Johnson won everybody's heart. Although he is one of the league's highest-paid players, Johnson took a salary cut last season so the Lakers could afford guard Terry Teagle.

This past summer, his annual all-star game and black-tie dinner raised $1.5 million for the United Negro College Fund. He collected $5 million for the organization through five similar events, and supported such charities as Muscular Dystrophy, City of Hope and the American Heart Association, among many others.

Johnson himself is not a college

A magic man

Here is a partial list of Magic Johnson's achievements.

- Lead the Los Angeles Lakers to five NBA championships.
- Lead the Lakers to nine appearances in the NBA finals.
- Holds the NBA record for career assists.
- Won league MVP honors in 1986-87, 1988-89 and 1989-90.
- Has collected over $5 million for the United Negro College Fund.

Johnson

graduate, having left Michigan State University after his sophomore year to enter the basketball draft, where he was selected first overall by the Lakers.

His lack of a degree is rarely visible. He is regarded as a shrewd businessman, his non-athletic talents strong enough to attract the omnipotent Michael Ovitz as his talent agent.

In locker rooms, he has been the favorite of sportswriters, patiently and thoughtfully answering even the most insipid questions. He would never leave his cubicle until the final reporter left, often hours after the game's final seconds ticked off.

As a player, he would rather pass than score, would prefer to make a teammate look good than seize all the theatrics for himself. He is a big man — 6-foot-9 — with a surgeon's delicate touch. Before his arrival, guards generally had been small. But he had superior skills, and made everybody around him better.

Fittingly, for perhaps the game's most unselfish player, he holds the NBA record for most career assists.

AIDS hot line busy number

Johnson's news surprises, shocks superstar's fans

By the Associated Press

RALEIGH, N.C. — Operators at an AIDS hot line were besieged with telephone calls Thursday after news broke that basketball star Magic Johnson has the HIV virus.

National AIDS Hotline 1-800-342-AIDS

"I think everybody is surprised and shocked about the news because he's such an important sports figure and role model for all of us," said Peggy Clarke, executive director of the organization that runs the National AIDS Hotline.

"It's causing a lot of people to ask about their own infections," she said. "We have a lot of people calling about it, recognizing that AIDS can happen to anyone."

Thirty counselors at the hot line were busy fielding calls Thursday evening. Dozens of people were waiting on hold, Clarke said.

She said the counselors generally handle 3,800 calls per day, but she expected that number to rise dramatically in the wake of Johnson's announcement.

Johnson, who helped the Los Angeles Lakers to five NBA championships, said at a news conference he had tested positive for HIV and was retiring. Johnson and his doctors stressed he didn't have AIDS, a disease of the immune system caused by HIV for which there is no known cure.

Clarke said the positive image Johnson presented might help others cope with the disease.

"This is one of the most prominent sports figures in our country, a role model for young people and adults as well," she said. "Clearly, his willingness to speak out will be a real positive thing in educating the public."

Great presidents show leadership

'Great people never give up,' Wefald says

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

People predicted in 1986 that K-State was in an irreversible decline and that enrollment in the 1990s would recede to and stay at 13,000.

They didn't know Jon Wefald. "They didn't understand that one person with an agenda, with determination, can make an impact on the world, America, and on Kansas," said President Wefald. "Today we're not at 13,000, not at 16,500. We're at 21,000. And they said it couldn't be done."

Wefald spoke about "American History: The Great American Presidents and Their Leadership," to about 50 people Tuesday afternoon in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

The lecture was one of 12 scheduled this week as part of Blue Key Leadership Week.

Wefald has been president since 1986, the year the decline was predicted. He said he loves when people say something can't be done.

"I'm here to tell you one ordinary person can make a difference," he said. "The only thing I didn't know was that it would be tougher to turn the football team around than the University."

Wefald used the changes taking place in Germany to illustrate that what people think will happen doesn't always come true.

"Nobody in 1989 thought the Berlin Wall would fall — leading authorities, presidents. No one," he said. "But it did fall."

Wefald's lecture focused on references to presidents in American history — why some were successful and why some were not.

"What is leadership? It depends on who you ask. But, from my point of view, it can be best described through American history," he said.

Wefald said if John F. Kennedy would not have been assassinated, the United States would not have been so deeply involved in Vietnam.

"Vietnam was not inevitable. It was not vital to national security. It was not then and is not now vital to national security," he said. "If Kennedy would have lived, he would have admitted that it was not vital. But we didn't have him after Nov. 22, 1963."

Wefald said one does not have to be a genius to make a difference.

"American democracy is based on the belief that ordinary people have extraordinary possibilities," he said. "I'll use an example you can all relate to."

The example was former K-State basketball player Steve Henson. When he first came to K-State, people didn't think he could play in the Big Eight. In fact, Henson himself had his doubts, Wefald said.

"He was a good athlete — not a great one, but he willed it. He said, 'I'm gonna do it.' He took his skills and perfected them."

"Great people never give up," Wefald said.

Wefald said people need to have seven qualities to be great.

The first was vision. He said a great leader must have a game plan.

"Three months ago, Bush was unbeatable. But today he is because he's not coming up with a game plan for our economy," he said. "In the domestic arena, you tell me what his game plan is."

The ability to make decisions is another important trait, and the lack of it was one of Theodore Roosevelt's faults as a president, he said.

"Why was Theodore Roosevelt's mind like a bed? Because it had to be made up for him every night," Wefald said jokingly.

People also have to be able to communicate a vision; have determination, confidence and compassion for others; and surround themselves with good people to be great, Wefald said.

Abraham Lincoln was successful, in part, because he surrounded himself with a very smart and outspoken staff, he said. The staff members thought they were just as smart, or smarter, than President Lincoln.

One of Lincoln's top cabinet officers even thought he should have more authority delegated to him, and he let Lincoln know, Wefald said.

"There was a confidential internal memo that said, 'Dear Mr. President, why don't you turn this over to me? I can do this,'" Wefald said.

"It's devastating to us," Lakers General Manager Jerry West said.

"It's really a tragedy," said forward Kevin McHale of the NBA's Boston Celtics. "I mean, the guy has not only been such a great player, but he's been such a great ambassador for the game and everything else."

"It's unreal what happened," said his high school coach, George Fox, in Lansing, Mich. "He was a dream come true ... just a beautiful person that bettered everyone that came in contact with him. We're in shock here at the house. Anybody that knew him has got to be devastated."

On the floor of Congress, Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., said that "this just points out once again to all of us that the AIDS virus is probably going to touch every single family in the country."

"All my love and support is with him," Elizabeth Taylor, a star anti-AIDS crusader, said in London.

Johnson said he was looking forward to retirement, but would miss professional basketball.

"I'll miss the battles and the wars," he said. "Most of what I'll miss is the camaraderie with the guys."

He said he didn't feel ill, adding: "This is not like my life is over, because it's not. I'm going to live long. ... I can work out and do everything a normal person can do."

Johnson has been anything but normal in his basketball career. At 6-foot-9, Johnson revolutionized the point-guard position after leading Michigan State to the NCAA championship as a sophomore in 1979.

His 9,921 assists are a National Basketball Association record.

He was the first selection in the 1979 draft and immediately established himself as one of the league's best players, leading the Lakers to the league championship the following spring.

With center Kareem Abdul-Jabbar unable to play because of injury in the sixth game of the finals against Philadelphia, Johnson came through with a storybook performance.

Playing all five positions, he had 42 points, 15 rebounds and seven assists in a 123-107 Lakers victory to clinch the title in Philadelphia.

He was selected as the MVP of the finals, the first rookie to receive such an honor.

The Lakers reached the finals nine times in Johnson's 12 seasons, most recently in June, when they were beaten by the Chicago Bulls in five games.

Magic will be missed

Magic is now just Earvin.

And Earvin is in for a fight like none Magic ever experienced.

The shocking news Thursday afternoon that Earvin "Magic" Johnson had tested positive for HIV backed one of sports' most recognizable stars into a corner from which no human being has yet to emerge.

Johnson, the heart and soul of the Los Angeles Laker dynasty of the 1980s, made the announcement to a packed media gathering at the Great Western Forum in Inglewood, Calif., late Thursday afternoon.

It was most assuredly Earvin Johnson, not Magic, who made a brief statement and answered questions in a room just below the court on which he made so many people happy for so long.

This was an Earvin Johnson minus the trademark smile that made teammates and fans relax, made referees antsy and made opponents back away with a healthy respect.

This was a man seemingly speaking of the plight of someone else, a man absent the overflowing emotion that had characterized the man we came to know and love as Magic.

Johnson did not stammer, he did not stutter, and not once did he shed a tear. He spoke of love for teammates, love for kids and a healthy respect for the media.

But he did so in a way we had never seen from this hero, this demigod in a Laker uniform.

Basketball, it seems, had taken a back seat. The jovial Magic had given way to an Earvin forced to deal with his own mortality.

That's fair. That's understandable.

When Earvin Johnson finds time to cry, he'll likely do it with his wife, his long-time teammates Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Michael Cooper, and he'll do so away from the glare of the public spotlight.

It's only appropriate that this be the case.

In the meantime, Earvin Johnson will be taking the safe-sex crusade to the streets, helping others with HIV keep the faith, and bringing an end to a life that has filled others with joy for so long.

But don't cry for Johnson just yet.

Don't write the obituary on Earvin Johnson. The basketball career of the man we knew as Magic is over. The life of the man we know as Earvin is not.

None of us is omniscient. None of us holds Johnson's fate in his hands. We can only watch, wait and pray that this man has time to spread the word, to help another, to save a life before his life is snuffed out by the world's most mysterious — and deadly — disease.

Basketball fans have been robbed of a talent like no other the game has seen. Johnson and Larry Bird brought the NBA back from the brink, and did so together, locked in combat on the floors of Boston Garden and the aforementioned Forum.

But Johnson must fight this fight alone.

In reality, however, he's far from alone. Upon learning he had tested positive, Johnson called Jabbar, Cooper, Bird, Michael Jordan and Isiah Thomas. Not a bad lineup of friends.

But five fellow players have been joined by a nation now in shock, a nation now forced to take a long, hard look at a disease for which there are so many questions and so few answers.

People are now forced to look inside, to deal with questions of their own mortality, to question their own practices in dealing with sex and drug abuse.

It can be said that something good might come of this.

Johnson surely intends to make his final fight one for which we will all remember him.

But this isn't a man campaigning to be a martyr. This isn't a man

Cats try to shake the 'albatross'

K-State favored by 3 points despite 29-game road losing streak

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

The albatross, as Bill Snyder referred to it at his weekly press conference Tuesday, is still there.

The K-State football team, winless on the road since 1985, looks to shed some unwanted baggage Saturday, and that albatross right along with it.

A 1 p.m. contest in Ames, Iowa, against the Iowa State Cyclones provides the best real chance the Wildcats have had at gaining a road win in at least five years.

Snyder's troops will enter the game as three-point favorites. Even though the Cyclones are coming off a road win at Missouri and the Cats have lost three straight, K-State is favored to do something it has not done since Lee Moon was interim coach and Ronald Reagan was beginning his second term as President.

"We want to go out on an upswing, knowing that we've got the program heading in a positive direction," said wide receiver Frank Hernandez, who is about to enter the final three games of his career in purple.

Standing in the way of that elusive road triumph is Iowa State, 3-4-1 overall and 1-2-1 in the Big Eight.

This is a Cyclone club that has lived predominantly by the run, but is beginning to showcase the passing talents of running quarterback Kevin Caldwell as well.

At one point earlier this year, Iowa State threw the ball less than 10 times in a game.

"Preparing for a team that threw the ball only five times in a particular game is frightening," Snyder said. "We know they can throw the ball, but it's a question of whether they will."

The emergence of Caldwell following an injury to previous starter

Chris Pedersen has led to uncertainty for Cyclone opponents and to a change in direction for ISU.

Caldwell rushed for 154 yards on 30 carries against Missouri, a record for an Iowa State quarterback. And he had a six-of-12 day through the air for 80 yards in Iowa State's 6-6 sister-kissing with Oklahoma State.

"I know Jim (Iowa State coach Walden) is trying to get Caldwell to the point where he's comfortable with the entire offense, and to where they can utilize his talents best," Snyder said.

Where K-State is trying to travel is previously uncharted ground.

Not since a 20-17 win over Missouri in Columbia, Mo., six seasons ago has a team representing K-State on an opposing football field walked off with a win.

Hernandez said his mates haven't lost track of that fact, nor have they forgotten that wins in at least two of the remaining three games will lead to the first winning season in K-State football since 1982.

"From a team standpoint, we need to have a winning season, need to take the next step," he said. "We all want to be part of that."

If the first step is to happen Saturday, K-State will have to lose another, less-imposing albatross.

The Cats haven't won in Ames since 1982 when Steve Willis booted three field goals in a 9-3 K-State win. K-State downed Iowa State 28-14 in Manhattan last season.

Not a pretty exhibit

Struggling Cats beat Ukraine 63-57

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Coach Dana Altman's words proved true, even in a 63-55 win over the Ukraine National Team.

"We've got a long way to go," was Altman's assessment of the inexperienced Wildcats prior to their first exhibition contest Thursday night.

The team went about proving those words to be true from the very start. In just two minutes, sloppy passing and confused defensive assignments helped the Wildcats fall behind 8-2, as Ukraine guard Alexander Kravchenko drained two 3-pointers.

Defense disappointed Altman the most. The Ukraine team used a spread offense and kickout passes from penetrating guards to keep the Cats' defense off balance.

"We broke down at times," Altman said of the defensive effort. "We didn't slide our feet. This team was real difficult to play, because they are a little unorthodox, like many European teams are. But we knew that going in and just didn't make the adjustment."

A third 3-pointer by Kravchenko put Ukraine ahead 15-8 with 12:07 left in the first half. Trasel Rone came off the bench to give the Cats a lift, scoring six points as K-State ran off 12 unanswered points over the next 5:30. K-State led 30-25 at the half.

The Ukraine team fought back over the first nine minutes of the second half, holding the Cats to just three points. Shooting droughts stalled K-State throughout the contest.

"I'd thought we'd come out and shoot the ball a little better," Altman said. "I knew our offense wasn't ready to go with only three weeks of practice. But that was really disappointing."

The Cats connected on just 35 percent of their shots, but swingman Rone kept the hot hand, holding the Cats close. With the Cats trailing 38-33 at 11:10, Rone struck shortly after coming off the bench again, drilling his second 3-pointer that set off another K-State surge.

Guard Vincent Jackson picked off a Ukraine pass in the backcourt on the ensuing trip down the floor, returning it for an uncontested layup. Then Marcus Zeigler, spearheading the full-court pressure that had frustrated the Ukraine team the entire night, intercepted the inbound pass and fed Rone on the right wing. Rone nailed his second 3-pointer in less than a minute and put the Cats ahead 41-38.

"I got the opportunities tonight, and if the 3-point shot is there, I'm not afraid to take it," Rone said. "I was a little nervous tonight because this was our first time out. But I always feel comfortable offensively."

"Trasel had a good effort for us tonight," Altman said. "Defensively he did some good things, and other than one long one in the second half, I felt like he took pretty good shots."

Breakdowns in defense and rebounding kept the Wildcats from putting the game away. The Ukraine team fought back to trail 50-49 with 1:50 left. But Rone wasn't finished yet. Hitting his fourth 3-pointer of the game, he helped hold off two late 3-pointers by the visitors. The Wildcats converted eight of eight free throws to put the game away.

"I am disappointed that we didn't play better than we did," Altman said. "But that's the reason we play exhibition games, to get some of that nervousness out and get up and down the floor and see what we need to Altman pointed to the team's rebounding as the one area that helped the Ukrainians stay in the game. The Cats were outrebounded 35-32.

"On the boards, if we're going to have a good basketball team, we've got to rebound a lot better than we did tonight," Altman said. "We got outrebounded tonight, and one of our goals tonight was to really get after them on the boards, and we just didn't do it at all."

"After three weeks of practice, I didn't think we would be this far behind on the boards and on defense.

The offense, although I expected a few more shots to drop, I didn't think was all that bad."

Lusnic, Riniker move step closer

By the Collegian Staff

Two K-State tennis players advanced to the quarterfinals of the Rolex Central Region Women's Championships Thursday in Omaha, Neb.

Freshman Karin Lusnic won two matches to advance to the round of eight in singles play. She defeated Frederia Lentina of Brigham Young 6-0, 6-2 and Stacy Bullman of Oklahoma 6-1, 6-0. Lusnic plays Lisa Salvatierra from Utah today.

Sophomore Michele Riniker also won a pair of straight-set matches. Riniker defeated Eva Gonzalez of Southwest Missouri State 7-5, 6-1 and Idaho State's Rebecca Smith 6-2, 7-6.

Senior Neili Wilcox advanced in the consolation bracket and will face Angie Moore of Colorado today.

Four players were eliminated from the tournament. Freshman Mareke Plocher lost to the tournament's top-seed, Christina Siriani, of Oklahoma State 3-6, 6-2, 6-2.

"Mareke played very well," K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said. "I thought it was one of the best matches I've seen in a tournament so far, and there have been some excellent matches played."

"We have some players out of the tournament, but they have gotten some valuable experience. I hope they learn some lessons that make them and the team stronger."

Ringgenberg hired as assistant

Former K-State outfielder Russ Ringgenberg was named an assistant baseball coach by Wildcat head coach Mike Clark on Thursday.

Ringgenberg, a Manhattan native, returns to K-State from Coffeyville Community College, where he was a volunteer assistant since August. His primary duties for K-State will be coaching the outfield and base running.

"Russ is from our program, so he knows our strengths and weaknesses," Clark said. "In working with us, he has done a great job in organizing our base running and the discipline that belongs there. He's done a super job with the outfielders working fundamentally day to day with them."

U.S. soldiers left behind in Vietnam, official says

Pentagon, POW hunters have no support for reports

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The head of the U.S. office in Hanoi said Wednesday that U.S. servicemen were left behind as prisoners in Vietnam, but there is no proof that any of them are still alive.

In addition, Garnett Bell Jr. said the United States has the names and addresses of private citizens in Vietnam who are believed to have recovered the remains of American servicemen killed in the war, but contacting them is difficult, and they often want money.

Two other U.S. POW hunters said they had not heard the reports that servicemen had been left behind and didn't have any evidence to support them. The Pentagon says all American POWs were returned or died.

Bell said between 1973 and 1975, the United States began receiving reports that Americans were still being held, but they were unconfirmed.

Testifying before the special Senate committee investigating the fate of the 2,273 U.S. servicemen still listed as missing in action from the war in Indochina, Bell said evidence gathered since then convinced him that the initial reports were true.

"After we began to interview refugees and based on the investigations we conducted ... I think we can say that with certainty now," said Bell, who is the chief of the U.S. Office for POW-MIA Affairs in Hanoi and has been working on this issue for 23 years.

Asked how many Americans were left behind, Bell replied, "Possibly 10 or less."

Bell did not discuss the circumstances under which the Americans were being held, or what has been learned of their fate. However, he said his office has gathered no proof that any Americans are still alive in Vietnamese captivity.

Vietnam's ambassador to the United Nations, Trinh Xuan Lang, denied that his government was holding any American prisoners. Lang was attending the committee's hearings as an observer.

When asked specifically whether Vietnam kept any American prisoners after POWs had been returned to the United States in early 1973, Lang responded: "No."

The two POW hunters who testified that they had no evidence to support Bell's contentions were William Gadoury Jr., of the Joint Casualty Resolution Center in Laos and Army Col. John Cole, director of the Stoney Beach, Thailand, office of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

Bell said leaving those people behind may have just been the product of circumstances surrounding the end of the war. Trying to check out the reports at the time was difficult and became impossible for years after the fall of Saigon in 1975.

"We lost access to the country," he said.

Even now, the search for remains of dead Americans is hampered because the sites where they crashed have been dug up by scavengers, who hauled away the metal for re-use and stashed the bones, possibly to swap for cash, Bell said.

In some cases, the United States knows where the bodies are.

"We have numerous reports in our file that give the name, address and location of people who have remains that are associated with valid names" of missing American servicemen, Bell said. But U.S. search teams are allowed to go to those addresses only if they happen to be in the area anyway.

No remains have been bought because U.S. policy forbids paying for them, Bell said. The price ranges from a few dollars to about $5,000, he said.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass, chairman of the committee, called on the Vietnamese government to secure the release of those remains.

"The government of Vietnam has an obligation if indeed it has accepted this issue as a humanitarian issue, as we continually hear, to see that for humanitarian reasons those remains are returned without any further demand for payment," Kerry said.

Lang, Vietnam's ambassador, repeated his government's pledge to assist in the MIA issue on humanitarian grounds and denied that Hanoi has any information on American servicemen that it has not shared with the United States.

ROTC recalls prisoners of war

POW-MIA week includes cage vigil, memorial ceremonies

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

A single prisoner sits alone in a bamboo cage. A passer-by stops to watch. She just sits there.

"Prisoners are supposed to look somber," said Marc Scantlin, sophomore in business management.

Every hour or two, a different prisoner enters the cage. The prisoners are members of the Arnold Air Society, an Air Force ROTC honorary.

The ritual commemorates the 92,550 prisoners of war and soldiers missing in action from World War I, World War II, Korea and Vietnam.

The bamboo cage is part of POW-MIA week activities.

David Farmer, sophomore in business management, spent time in the cage.

"This is no comparison to what those guys went through. There just isn't any comparison," he said. "What those guys fought to preserve was freedom, and what people need to realize is that freedom just isn't free."

While the POW-MIA week has been going on at K-State since the Vietnam Veterans Memorial was built, this is the first year the commemoration week has included a prisoner in a bamboo cage.

to remember the POWs and MIAs throughout the entire week.

"We are required to have some sort of demonstration for 24 hours to remember POW and MIA soldiers. This is our 24 hours to remember," said Kyle Hoffman, sophomore in agricultural technology management.

Other events are a candlelight ceremony at 7:30 tonight. Those wishing to participate in the candlelight ceremony should meet in the Union Courtyard.

A plaque of remembrance will be dedicated Monday in honor of a K-

State graduate lost in the Persian Gulf War. The dedication will be near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial at 11 a.m.

Air Force and Army ROTC will participate in a retreat ceremony at 4 p.m. The groups will exchange the memorial's flags with new ones.

Willingham agreed and said officers watched his store closely.

"The girls who closed would say there was always a unit around and they felt safe," he said. "I would imagine that would continue."

In addition to security and cosmetic changes, another physical change Willingham made was to clear the field located just west of his store.

"I was just letting it grow, you know for nature or whatever, but now it's completely cleared, trees and all," he said. "That's where they hid the military vehicle that night, but now, there's no place there to hide."

Willingham said he was concerned that the two men charged allegedly used military equipment.

"A lot of things would have been different if they didn't have access to the equipment," he said.

Although Deppish would not confirm that the two Fort Riley suspects were driving a military vehicle, Fort Riley's Criminal Investigation Division did.

CID Special Agent Dennis Wade said they did not know the vehicle had been borrowed until the two suspects told the CID and Geary County Sheriff's Office the night they were arrested.

"When you borrow it and bring it back, it's called wrongful appropriation," he said. "The vehicle is the least of their problems."

Wade said stealing a military vehicle is not difficult because it is not locked like a regular vehicle.

"They're just locked with regular padlocks," he said.

Wade said he did not know Turner and Ellibe would be charged in the Heintz murder, but he did suspect it would be someone in the military.

"Eighty percent of the crime in this area is committed by soldiers, plus the location of the store," he said.

Wade said when military personnel are convicted of crimes, they are issued chapter discharges.

But if Turner and Ellibe are found innocent, Wade said, they could be court-martialed for the felony crime or for the wrongful appropriation of the vehicle.

After Wade was told Pate's store had made some changes to help prevent such crimes from occurring there in the future, he said he wasn't sure it would do much good.

"It's just a bad location. There's not much you can do when it's just out there by itself," he said. "I don't think it matters if it's a male or female, either. If someone decides to rob a place, it matters if there is one person or two."

"It's sad we weren't in the right seats," Wefald said. "I didn't care where we sat."

Hug said being moved made him very angry and hard for him to enjoy the show.

He said, however, Wefald has made it up to him and his roommate. After Wefald heard about the misunderstanding, he apologized to Hug and Warren and offered to buy them tickets for the upcoming Queensryche concert.

"I would never pull rank on someone," Wefald said, "especially a student."

king in my book.

But that cold January night when he brought that big gray album out of his brother's collection, I remembered all I had heard about Led Zeppelin. They were evil and tried to steal the souls of teenagers with backwards-masked incantations about Satan.

He put the scratched-up album on his little turntable and turned the flickering light bulb off. Outside, the wind blasted the snow against the window. We listened about the lady who knew all that glitters is gold and was buying a stairway to heaven at least 20 times.

Then we would listen to it backwards for Satan to see if all the stories were true. I secretly prayed, while Heath wasn't looking, that God would not curse my little soul for listening to this blasphemous rock 'n' roll. I listened and listened, but I didn't hear Satan talking to me, and I didn't feel my soul leave my body. I did hear the words "sandwich man," and I don't think I was imagining things.

"Stairway to Heaven" was never released as a single, I found out later, but it has found a place on every classic-rock radio station's playlist across the country. Once, in my DJ days at Power 94.5, I played "Stairway" at midnight, and little kids across the Midwest accustomed to hearing the New Kids on the Block turned off the radio.

I used to DJ at K-Rock, too, doing an all-request show as Dave Manson. You couldn't count on your hands the times 17-year-olds who'd discovered Led Zeppelin for the first time only days before would request that song as if no one had ever played it. I used to lie and tell them, "I'll get it right on, dude."

I got so sick of that song. In fact, one morning when I was scheduled to go in to the station, my alarm blared that song, and I threw my alarm clock to the floor and went back to sleep. They fired me for not coming in to work.

Society creates historic site

Riley County's museum exhibits native crafts, art

DAVID BULLOCK

In one of its recent advertisements, the Riley County Historical Society claimed "the past is present in Manhattan."

This catchy phrase suggests the society has historical holdings relevant to the contemporary life of the county. Essentially, this is an invitational challenge and a challenge well worth taking up.

The society's main museum is located at 2309 Claflin Road. Many first-time visitors will turn off Claflin and mistakenly attempt to enter the historic, stone-structured Goodnow House, which is actually State of Kansas property.

The Riley County Historical Society's main museum is located behind Goodnow in a surprisingly modern-looking, one-story building. This unlikely facade belies the many historical treasures inside.

Hanging above the foyer entrance is a large iron bell that was once aboard the paddleboat Hartford. The Hartford carried many settlers from the eastern United States into the Manhattan area in the 1850s before the Civil War.

It is interesting to note that one of these voyages is commemorated in a little-known stained-glass mural in the First United Methodist Church at 612 Poyntz. And, a small, prefabricated home, which settlers brought with them on the Hartford, can be seen standing just outside the main museum.

The foyer area also encloses a gift shop, which is in itself a bit of Americana gone by. Books written by local scholars about Kansas as well as Riley County address a plethora of native crafts and historical sites. Gaily-colored, rosy-cheeked faces smile from the covers of reprinted, facsimile Victorian greeting and holiday cards. Spices, jams, glassware and needlework are for sale.

The center galleries contain several thematic displays. Of particular interest to anyone who has complained of round-the-house chores is the "Household Work Week" exhibit.

Many of the washing machines, ice boxes, typewriters and early vacuum cleaners can only be described as "mechanical contraptions." One can only appreciate the patience of those who used them.

The rear galleries offer an interesting "Land and the People" exhibit.

The settlers and Native Americans are featured in an compelling display of comparison and contrast. Basic tools common to each culture are remarkable for their simplicity and utility. A massive arrowhead collection, surely one of the state's finest, stands near the center galleries.

Elsewhere, the museum contains delightful examples of furniture with intricate hand-carvings, pianos and informational displays pertinent to the early development of Manhattan. The Jean C. Dallas Gallery houses a rotating presentation of arts and crafts.

The society's major upcoming program will be from 1 to 5 p.m. Dec. 7 and 8 at the Wolf-Butterfield House. The event is "The Riley County Home Front" during World War II. This was the time of scrap metal and canning drives and the "victory garden," when Americans pulled together as one.

In an era of shrinking budgets, this staff has accomplished much with little. Indeed, as their advertisement suggests, "the past is present in Manhattan." And yet, given their quality of experience and interpretive direction, one must conclude that the path on which they run is really back to the future.

Rush concert worth snowy trek

'Roll the Bones' tour, Eric Johnson make top-notch show

FRANK SERENO

Contributing A&E Writer

Editor's note: Frank Sereno is the host for KSDB's "Rock of Ages" and a sophomore in business administration.

Despite a small snow storm that turned Kansas into the "Great White North," Topeka's Kansas Expo Centre was the place to be Wednesday.

The reason was Rush's "Roll the Bones" tour and opening act Eric Johnson.

QUEST REVIEWER

Playing to an almost sold-out arena, headliner Rush and Johnson performed with an exquisite musical talent usually not seen during the average, lame, mediocre performance. If concert-goers were looking for quality rock 'n' roll, this was the concert to see.

Rush — the Canadian progressive power trio featuring bassist/vocalist/keyboardist Geddy Lee, guitarist Alex Lifeson and percussionist Neil Peart — have been together since 1974 and have steadily produced a total of 18 albums, including their latest effort, "Roll the Bones."

The 1986 Grammy nominee guitarist/vocalist Eric Johnson, along with percussionist Tommy Taylor and bassist Kyle Brock, is touring in support of his second album, "Ah Via Musicom."

Aside from this and Johnson's first album, "tones," the Austin, Texas, native has also performed with musicians such as Christopher Cross, Carole King and Cat Stevens.

It comes as no surprise that Johnson would venture out on his own to try his luck at the big time, and fortunately for us, he definitely has what it takes to be one of the best guitarists around.

Johnson kicked off his straightforward rock promptly and proceeded into a blistering attack with his soon-to-be-famous style of guitar playing.

From his haunting, flowing chords to an intense concentration of melodic changes and variations, it didn't take long before most of the audience was on its feet, responding appreciatively after every song — and rightfully so.

With great support from Taylor and Brock, Johnson was free to roam wherever he wanted to on his 1954 Fender Stratocaster, and, in return, the crowd responded with a standing ovation after the trio's eight-song, 40-minute set.

Although the bass wasn't clear at times, and the vocals were nothing extra special, it really didn't matter because it was all made up with the incredible energy and speed that Johnson possesses.

With an intense stare of diligence that never left his instrument accompanied by lightning-fast fingers, I was surprised to see guitar strings still intact after he finished.

After a brief intermission, Rush took the stage for a 24-song, two-hour show filled with both old and new original music.

Accompanied with one of the best laser and light displays in the country, a backdrop that featured cartoon videos and 40-foot dancing rabbits, it was obvious the main goal of the evening was to hear some excellent music and have a good time despite the snow and cold outside.

Rush opened the show with "The Force Ten" and proceeded directly into one of the group's most popular songs, "Limelight."

Not to stop the jam prematurely, Rush continued to play music from the past with "Freewill" and "Distant Early Warning." Before the band paused for its first break, Til Tuesday's Aimee Mann joined Rush via the video screen to sing "Time Stand Still" in perfect sync with the band.

After a brief hello, the Canadian ambassadors of rock proceeded to play three songs from their latest album — "Dreamline," "Bravado" and the title cut. During this set of new music, Lee, Lifeson and Peart broke into a lengthy version of "Bravado" and proved they can still play rock 'n' roll better than anyone around.

With the combination of Lee's

Fine arts allocation lets people see works; students visit Chicago

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

The fine arts fee, passed in spring 1989, has brought many artists to campus and has sent students on a trip to Chicago.

This year the art department was allocated $26,400 of the revenue collected from the fee to increase students' exposure to the arts.

Gary Woodward, associate professor of art, said the department's mission in spending the money is twofold. The first goal is to bring a variety of exhibitions and guest artists to the campus. The second is to sponsor trips to take students to major art centers.

"We really try to get a variety of things so there's a good amount of diversity in the things we bring in and the things we go to," Woodward said.

Robert Hower, associate professor of art, was the first exhibitor of the semester. His computer-aided prints and constructions were shown Aug. 19-Sept. 6. The constructivist paintings of Sidney Stuart, professor of art at South Dakota State University, were shown during October.

The biggest event of the year was the recent symposium which brought four well-known illustrators to show their work and lead panel discussions. Kathi Hudson, art instructor, said there were a variety of students participating in the symposium.

"I think it broadens the cultural base for the students. We hope to hit a wide spectrum of students," Hudson said.

Hudson accompanied a group of about 40 students to Chicago Sept. 19-21 for the International New Art Forms Exhibit. The group also toured the Chicago Art Institute, other galleries and tourist spots.

The trip was open to any student, and the art department paid for about one-third of the expenses, while the students paid the rest.

The next event sponsored by the fine arts fee will include contemporary masters from the Chicago area. The show will start Nov. 24.

Another exhibit sponsored by the fee was Robert Schwiager's showing in Gallery Six in the art building. The work of the professor from Missouri Southern University was displayed Sept. 16-Oct. 4.

The art department also allocates funds to the shows the Union Program Council plans, as well as some of the UPC's art films.

Hudson said the department also plans bus trips to regional museums and galleries.

Grusin releases new album

'Zephyr' uses mixed-up vocals, variety of styles

SARAH VIDA

Contributing A&E Writer

Editor's note: Sarah Vida is a member of New Currents, K-State's New Age/Jazz/Fusion music appreciation club.

Don Grusin's "Zephyr" is a unique blend of old and new syncretized rhythms and relaxing melodies.

QUEST REVIEWER

As you jump into the album, you get the feeling of being right at a concert. Each instrument contributes to the title track, which gives you a feeling of what's to come on the following tracks.

With the definite conclusion of the first track, Grusin complements it with the drastic change of style.

He slows the pace down — but not too much — on "Tonight, Pure Love" and introduces violinist Jerry Goodman. The violin possesses a lyrical quality, which shows lyrics don't always have to be vocal.

If Grusin had paid closer attention to this fact, "Still Good Lookin'" would be more successful. The introduction to the song is hyper and out of control and is controlled only by the saxophone and guitar.

The introduction is also misleading to the exact direction of the song. But with the addition of vocals, the direction is soon realized — down. Grusin's voice is of a nasal quality, which detracts from the rhythmic mood the composition creates.

"Anoranza," has a reflective quality. The music does not intrude upon the listener's thoughts. Overall, the music is the same in the middle and end as it is in the beginning.

This may seem boring to someone who pays close attention to the music, but to a person who ponders and listens, it's a perfect match.

During "Hardwood," the usually present brass makes an exit. The dominating instruments of this song are the synthesizer, percussion, electric guitar and solo piano.

In "Storyteller," the dominant instrument is guest artist Eric Marienthal's soprano saxophone. The sax is reinforced with Grusin's synthesizing abilities. The dissonant vocals seem like an afterthought; if they

Center helps fathers

National Center for Fathering teaches men secrets of parenting

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

"Becoming a father is easy. Being a father is difficult," said Lowell Bliss, director of admission at the National Center for Fathering.

The National Center for Fathering is at 217 Southwind Place in Manhattan. The center does research, provides seminars, publishes newsletters and books, and provides speakers to interested groups.

The center is a private, non-profit organization. It was started three years ago by the national director Ken Canfield. Since then, it has spent more than $200,000 researching the subject of fathering.

The program was sparked by a 1985 study that showed the average father spends 37 seconds a day actively involved with his children.

"Men learn how to father by following models, primarily their own fathers," Bliss said. "Now we have a generation of fathers who didn't have fathers because of the high divorce rate or some other reason."

What the organization does is try to identify good characteristics in fathers. This is done by surveying thousands of fathers.

In 1990, the National Center for Fathering polled 3,000 American men about who their father role models were. Nearly 34 percent listed their own fathers, 22 percent listed a male relative, 19 percent listed no one, 11 percent listed an older non-relative friend, 9 percent listed the father of a friend and 5 percent listed others.

"These results say to me that if only 34 percent of the men in America listed their own father, at least 66 percent of fathers in this country have no idea of the importance of role modeling," Canfield said in a Topeka Capital-Journal article June 17, 1990.

The center tries to aid fathers by helping them identify their own strengths and weaknesses. This is done by using a detailed survey called the Personal Fathering Profile, a brochure containing 138 questions about fathering factors, fathering dimensions and fathering satisfactions.

Once the brochure has been filled out and the strengths and weaknesses have been established, the father is enrolled into a seven-week class. The classes are small and they focus on support and encouragement as they interact with other fathers.

This allows the fathers to gain insight from other fathers and learn from their experiences and ideas.

"We need to get men gathered together as women have been gathered together over the decades," Canfield said in a Chicago Sun-Times article Sept. 22, 1990.

"The fathering support groups have been the most helpful and have provided long-lasting results."

The National Center for Fathering has a hard copy of every abstract, journal article and dissertation about fathering published since 1950 — 4,000 articles in all — open to the public.

Kudrna said the students got a simple slap on the hand, and their final grades remained the same.

Although most instructors know this study method exists, most have not taken the measures Franke has taken to avoid tests getting out of the classroom.

According to Eric Schmutz, junior in political science, the problem of greeks having an advantage over other students when test time comes is up to the instructor.

files," Hoelzel said.

Matt Kudrna, senior in construction engineering, said he feels he has been cheated in some respect by people who use old tests to study. He said there was one incident where some members of a fraternity were all getting A's on their tests while the rest of the class was doing much worse. The instructor discovered that the students had gotten a hold of the old tests.

of the listener. This Grusin solo piece highlights his talents.

Native-inspired chants add to the tropical feel of "Tribe." As compared to the other tracks with voices, this is one of the few that works. "Tribe" is a definite get-up-and-dance track.

Grusin does not like to group certain styles and then move on to the next style. He continues this scheme by following "Tribe" with a song that brings the listener back to reflection. He once again adds vocals and makes it work this time.

rhythm bass and Peart's unrelenting pounding of the skins, Lifeson was able to go off and let his guitar wail and scream chords only he can produce with any success.

Continuing on after this first onslaught of self-indulgence, they played "Show, Don't Tell," "The Big Money," "Subdivisions," "The Pass" and an instrumental from "Roll the Bones" entitled "Where's My Thing?"

As with any concert, there comes a time when the percussionist gets to show what he is made of, and Peart did not disappoint when his number was called.

With a seven-minute-plus solo that included the most spectacular display of Vari-Lights I've ever seen, Peart proceeded to show why many rock fans think he is the most talented drummer in rock music.

Soviets celebrate end of Communist power

Food lines, riots contrast fireworks in St. Petersburg

By the Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, U.S.S.R. — The birthplace of the Bolshevik Revolution cheered the demise of Communist power with skydivers, fireworks and concerts Thursday. But the festivities contrasted starkly the angry lines at Soviet food stores.

In Moscow and elsewhere, people foraged for food in continued panic-buying before steep price increases take effect in the new year. Ethnic fighting in the Caucasus caused shortages that led to bread riots in Armenia.

The day that once was the most sacred holiday in the Soviet calendar was marked in the capital by two small rallies, kept 200 yards apart by police in gray greatcoats.

Communist supporters carrying Lenin placards marched through Red Square, denouncing Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev and Russian President Boris Yeltsin.

"It's not a holiday for me!" declared one older woman at the pro-Communist rally in front of the Lenin Mausoleum. "Hunger! Hunger!"

A subdued rally of anti-Communist demonstrators, led by Russian Orthodox priests, mourned the victims of the Soviet regime.

The traditional Red Square parade of soldiers, tanks and missiles that glorified Soviet power was canceled by Gorbachev after the failed coup discredited the party and forced the suspension of its activities.

Less than a mile away from the Kremlin, hundreds of people lined up glumly for bread at the capital's largest bread store. Queues for milk and bread formed elsewhere in the city early on the holiday morning.

Despite the nationwide economic crisis, the mood was upbeat in St. Petersburg, where more than 10,000 people massed in front of the Winter Palace to cheer the official rechristening of the city after more than half a century of being called Leningrad in honor of the founder of the Soviet state.

"You, the residents of this great city, must have pride in your city and do everything you can to make this a beauty and culture," popular Mayor Anatoly Sobchak told the crowd in front of the 200-year-old pastel palace.

The tricolor Russian flag fluttered from buildings. Stunt planes roared overhead and parachutists plunged down through the gray sky trailing red, white and blue streamers and nearly hitting spectators in Palace Square.

Spontaneous small groups denouncing the Communists sprung up around the huge square.

"I cannot forget the terror of Communism! I cannot forget the millions who died in labor camps!" St. Petersburg City Council member Marina Soliyev screeched to anybody who would listen. "This is a day of national tragedy."

Among the dignitaries in St. Petersburg was the successor to the Russian throne, Grand Duke Vladimir Kirillovich Romanov, who arrived from Paris on his first visit to his ancestral homeland. He spent Thursday visiting memorials to Russia's royal family and meeting with supporters.

Across town, about 2,000 Communist supporters rallied near the docked cruiser Aurora — a symbol of the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution — and chanted: "Leningrad! Leningrad!"

The mostly older men held red banners proclaiming "Glory to the Communist Party."

"I am a Communist 100 percent," 61-year-old Yuri Tirennev said, a red Soviet flag fluttering behind him. "We don't need Czar Boris (Yeltsin) or Duke Sobchak. I defended Leningrad during the war and will never accept St. Petersburg."

In Moscow, the 5,000 pro-Communist marchers denounced Yeltsin's decree Wednesday banning the Communist Party on the territory of the Russian republic, which encompasses two-thirds of the Soviet Union.

Standing around a statue of Lenin that is one of the few in the capital not scheduled to be torn down by the reformist City Council, the demonstrators said life was better for them under the hard-line Communists.

"It was never like this before, when you had to stand in line for 200 to 300 meters just to buy bread," said Alexander Myasnikov. "When we had socialism all the shops were full."

But the anti-Communist marchers said there was a different cost exacted by the old Soviet leadership.

"Tens of millions of people were destroyed by an anti-human regime that carried out genocide," said Viktor Aksuchits, chairman of the Russian Christian Democratic Union, speaking to a rally near the KGB headquarters.

In the Ukrainian capital of Kiev, pro- and anti-Communist demonstrators scuffled briefly, and 10 men were arrested and one hospitalized with minor injuries.

Small crowds of elderly people and World War II veterans laid flowers in front of statues of Lenin at rallies elsewhere in the country, including the Pacific port of Vladivostok and the Byelorussian capital of Minsk.

In the Armenian capital, Yerevan, shoppers searching for increasingly scarce bread attacked a bakery and had to be dispersed by Interior Ministry troops, Tass said Thursday.

Manhattan boy dies from leukemia

5-year-old James Owens' final wish realized in gift of dog

PAT OBLEY
City/Government Editor

James Owens, whose battle against leukemia and local housing authorities earned admiration throughout the state, died at his home Friday.

When Owens was diagnosed with his third relapse of the disease, doctors told the family the relapse was untreatable. The Owens asked James his final wish. James said he wanted a dog.

The Owens family lived in a low-income housing complex, run by the Manhattan Housing Authority. When James' mother Camelia Owens approached the MHA with James' request, it was initially turned down for being against the rules.

The MHA's decision prompted a city-wide telephone campaign, led by friends and relatives of the Owens family. The decision was quickly overturned.

As a result, James was introduced to Milo.

Milo, a three-month old, mixed breed "hound dog," as described by Camelia Owens, was chosen for his docile nature, which was conducive to James' state.

"He acts like Duke from the Beverly Hillbillies," she said shortly after the dog was brought to the Owens' home.

She said James named the dog after an imaginary pet he played with while going to visit his grandparents' dog, Boozie.

"He used to go over to his grandparents' house to see their dog, and he would go through a mile field to get there," she said. "On the way there, he pretended to play with an imaginary puppy named Milo.

"When I told James, 'I'm going to get you a dog,' he said 'a live one?'" she said. "He had never had anything but an imaginary dog before now."

For the Owens to keep Milo, Camelia Owens had to provide the MHA with a document signed by James' doctor verifying that he was dying. One of the conditions the MHA gave for allowing Milo was that he be removed from the home within 14 days of James' death.

Camelia Owens said Milo will stay with Boozie.

Recently, James said Milo had been a perfect friend.

"He goes with me everywhere and he doesn't even need to be tied up when we go outside," James said. "I was going to name him Spot, but he already knows his name."

During James' last weeks, the Owens family, neighbors and various organizations helped James celebrate the year's holidays.

Some stacks of books at Farrell Library are under wraps to protect them from water damage caused by leaks due to melting ice and snow.

About 2,000 books are not where they're supposed to be right now, Stacks Manager Cliff Conrad said, and many books cannot be reshelfed until the leaks stop.

"We're not shelving in stack levels 7a and 7b, or in 8b because when it starts to thaw, I figure they will get wet again," Conrad said.

Book stacks in these sections have been covered with plastic since the Halloween storm, which has been blamed for a rash of leaky roofs across campus.

Roofing Shop Manager John Kent said that in his 27 years on the job, he has never seen anything like this.

"We've had leaks where we've never had leaks before," he said.

Jack Watson, facilities assistant director of maintenance, also blamed the abnormal weather for the leaks and damaged books. At Farrell, the biggest problem is on the roof above the stacks where the pitched roof meets the flat roof, Watson said.

"You get sleet on a real high roof with pitch, and it's going to slide down," Watson said. "It doesn't run off like water. It just keeps backing up. It backs up under the shingles."

When sleet or ice starts to thaw, it has to have some place to go. Since the water can't go down because the shingles are covered with ice, it goes up underneath the shingles and down into the building where it's warmer, Watson said.

"The roof material and membrane is in good shape," Watson said.

Last week's colder temperature's slowed the leaks temporarily, but Preservation Librarian James Mason said he is concerned about what will happen as it warms up again.

As soon as the first leaks were spotted, Mason organized a disaster response team to remove wet books and cover those that were threatened.

Since Farrell has a history of leaks, Mason had enough supplies on hand to take care of the problem immediately. The library staff has already stapled and taped more than 2,000 square feet of plastic and gathered all the trash cans they could find.

Jean McDonald, administrative services officer, said since then Facilities has come in and done some creative draping to catch many small leaks and channel them into one large trash can.

McDonald said she thought Facilities had done as much as could be expected to bring the situation under control.

Mason said 240 wet books were spread on newspapers on his office floor and in the technical services room to dry. Most dried in five to seven days, but a few are still damp.

He said he must be careful not to put any of the books back before they are completely dry, since there is a danger of them molding and spreading the mold and moisture to other books.

"After a couple of days, you think the book might be dry. But, I leave it out for at least two to three days after that to be sure," Mason said.

Sorters won't be able to reshelve any of the books for awhile, at least until the rest of the ice melts and the leaks are stopped.

Nothing can be done about the water stains and crinkled pages, but some with distorted covers will have to be rebound.

"They'll be there, but they just won't look great," Mason said.

In an already overcrowded library, the damaged books will also take up more shelf space. Although a book press could be used to flatten the swollen books, Mason said this would encourage mold.

Because of the library staff's quick

Catholic school damaged in Friday morning blaze

Fire investigation continues; several rooms destroyed

Four rooms in the Manhattan Catholic Schools were destroyed by a fire early Friday morning.

After the Manhattan firefighters arrived at the scene, they went inside the school briefly, then came back out as flames began shooting through the roof, said Brian and Laura Favre, 731 Colorado St.

Four trucks were present, and an aerial unit was used to spray the roof of the building, said the Favres.

The cause of the fire has not been determined, but it might have been furnace problems which started the fire, said Larry Liotta, principal of Manhattan Catholic Schools. The cause of the blaze is still under investigation.

"They haven't said for sure yet, but they aren't ruling out any possibilities of arson," said the Rev. Randall Weber, associate priest for Seven Dolors Church.

The damage was worst in the grade school building. The band and music rooms along with three large storage rooms were heavily damaged, Liotta said.

Other damage in the building was the floor in the kitchen, which received water damage, and the gymnasium, which received smoke damage. A professional cleaning service was hired to repair the damage, Liotta said. The gymnasium has been treated twice, but the smoke smell hasn't abated yet.

"It was just the one part of the building that was damaged by the fire," Weber said.

Soviet troops leave Grozny

Nationalists in Chechen-Ingush force retreat of nearly 1,000 soldiers

By the Associated Press

GROZNY, U.S.S.R. — Nationalists in the secessionist enclave of Chechen-Ingush on Sunday forced the retreat of nearly 1,000 troops sent to enforce emergency rule imposed by the Russian Federation.

The peaceful departure of the soldiers — a day after they arrived — appeared to be a slap in the face to Russian President Boris Yeltsin, who is cracking down hard on his first separatist challenge.

Gen. Dzhokar Dudayev, a former Soviet army general who was sworn in Saturday as president of Chechen-Ingush, predicted more troops will be sent to the region.

Dudayev has led the drive by dominant nationalist Chechens to break from Russian control. His mostly Muslim, autonomous republic of 1.3 million people, declared itself independent a week ago. It said it feared domination by the Russian government.

Yeltsin refuses to allow any break-up of his federation. He said that would jeopardize market-oriented economic reforms. On Friday, he declared emergency rule in Chechen-Ingush.

Government-run Radio Rossiya quoted Russian Federation Vice President Alexander Rutskoi as saying an order had been issued for Dudayev's arrest, but that Yeltsin's representatives in Grozny, the region's capital, had failed to carry it out.

In Moscow, Russian legislators met Sunday to debate the emergency rule. Ruslan Khasbulatov, an ethnic Chechen who is chairman of the legislature, called Dudayev and his advisers a "group of bandits."

But the Yeltsin-appointed interior minister in Grozny, Chechen native Vakha Ibragimov, protested the decree and resigned, Radio Rossiya reported. The debate was continuing late into the evening.

Other Russian legislators criticized Yeltsin's decree and recessed after hours of inconclusive debate. The legislature was scheduled to resume consideration of the order Monday morning.

Meanwhile in Grozny, thousands of people rallied in Freedom Square for a second day to protest Yeltsin's decree.

At the city's military airport, jubilant nationalist fighters waving flags escorted 700 Soviet Interior Ministry troops in civilian buses to Beslan, a town on the border with the neighboring Russian territory of North Ossetia.

Another 150 troops who were inside the Interior Ministry were also sent to Beslan.

In the wake of the failed August coup, Yeltsin's government declared control over all Soviet Interior Ministry forces on Russian territory, ranging from regular soldiers to the feared anti-riot "black beret" forces.

"They were effectively in our sights. We could have taken hostages. We could have destroyed them, but we didn't want bloodshed," said the Chechen defense minister, Yusup Soslambekov.

Dudayev's National Guard, which he claims numbers 5,000 armed men, took control of Grozny's airport on Saturday and claimed to have captured the Soviet troops arriving to enforce the decree.

Soslambekov said the Soviet Interior Ministry asked that the troops be allowed to leave their positions.

Russian Deputy Interior Minister Vyacheslav Komissarov and Yeltsin's administrator of Chechen, Akhmed Arsanov, also reportedly sent a telegram to Yeltsin from Grozny suggesting the decree should be reconsidered.

Dudayev, however, predicted "provocation" from Yeltsin.

"I expect they (Russia) will go now to mass terrorist action, provocation, and a kindling of conflict using paratroopers and special troops to show the world the strength of their armed forces in individual small successes," he told a news conference.

Recession causes tough decisions for legislators

Senator says there's not enough money to go around

CHRISTINE VENDEL

When Kansas' needs outweigh its revenue, tough decisions must be made.

K-State and Kansas in general are in unenviable financial positions because of the current recession, said Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, Friday during the final speech of Leadership Week.

"Making projections into next year we find that if the economy grows by 3 percent and if there is no new revenue, we must cut expenditures by 1.9 percent," he said. "That's not a pleasant situation to be in."

Bogina is chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, a position considered by many people to be one of the most powerful in Topeka. This committee makes initial recommendations for the allocation of funds by the Senate.

Knowing this, it may seem appropriate that he spoke on the topic of, "Tough Policy Decisions at the State Level."

As chairman, Bogina said he has to make many difficult decisions.

"In the 1989 session I had to vote to not provide funding for heart transplants for some people. The taxpayers don't have the money," he said. "I

African Music Night Saturday

The sounds of Africa will be heard Saturday evening in the Manhattan City Auditorium during African Music Night.

Sandy Mothee, publicity officer for African Student Union, said they have the activity every year to allow other people to learn about African music. "We will have a DJ playing music from all over Africa, including the Indian Ocean," Mothee said.

In addition to the DJ, there will be a group playing African drums featuring the conga drums and other traditional instruments. Native dancing will accompany the playing.

The festivities begin at 8:30 p.m. and are open to all students and faculty of the University including family members.

Nellis elected to serve on NCGE

A professor of geography was recently elected vice president for research and external relations of the National Council for Geographic Education.

Duane Nellis was elected by the 3,800-member organization and will start this two-year term in January 1992.

Nellis said his duties will be to coordinate various research task forces of the NCGE, and promoting liaison activities with other national organizations interested in geographic education like the National Geographic Society.

Nellis will assume the position of president of the NCGE after his two-year term of vice-president is over.

He has been a member of the K-State faculty since 1980. He has been head of the geography department since 1987 and director of the Institute for Social and Behavioral Research since August 1990.

Nellis has received several university, national and international awards. At K-State he has been Student Organization Advisor of the Year, Outstanding Undergraduate Teacher Award winner and Presidential lecturer.

Nellis received his bachelor's in geography from Montana State University and his master's and doctorate from Oregon State University.

Spare 'Storm ammunition stays behind

MANAMA, Bahrain (AP) — Some 250,000 tons of ammunition will remain behind, but by mid-December all other U.S. Army tanks and other equipment will be shipped home from Saudi Arabia, the U.S. military said Sunday.

A British newspaper, meanwhile, accused allied armies of leaving 40 tons of depleted uranium on Persian Gulf War battlefields in the form of spent armor-piercing shells.

Maj. Charles Hayes, a spokesman for the U.S. military's Joint Information Bureau in Dhahran, said the ammunition would be shipped back by April.

In all, 350,000 tons of ammunition was sent to the kingdom, the main deployment point for U.S. forces fighting to oust Iraq from Kuwait. Hayes said that army logistics teams were busy cleaning, packing and shipping back the remaining 10,000 of an original 129,800 tanks, tracked vehicles and wheeled vehicles deployed in the kingdom.

The United States has signed agreements with Kuwait and Bahrain to leave weapons behind as part of a security pact. But Saudi Arabia is unwilling to allow such equipment on its soil. About 10,000 army personnel were in Saudi Arabia, he said. Hayes said most would be home by Christmas. Such troops haven't been stationed there since the war ended in February, however. They were rotated into the region since then.

Jealous husband kills wife, 3 others

HARRODSBURG, Ky. (AP) — A man followed his estranged wife as she drove to a restaurant with acquaintances and killed her and three others before committing suicide.

Tina Keck, whose father was among the dead Saturday, said the gunman, Robert Daigneau, was consumed by jealousy.

"He was very jealous and she had left him and he thought she had a date," Tina Keck said Sunday.

Donna Daigneau, 33, had noticed Daigneau following the car in which she was a passenger. So the car's driver, who also was killed, drove to where the police station had been and honked his horn, but the station had been moved.

Daigneau drove up beside them, jumped from his pickup truck and shot at the car's occupants, said Tina Keck, whose mother, Ann, was in the car but wasn't injured.

Police Chief Tim Bryant said Daigneau fired six shots into the car with his .357 Magnum.

In addition to Donna Daigneau, killed were Tina Keck's father, Palmer Rousey, 48, of Danville; Fred Alsmann Jr., 48, of the St. Louis suburb Webster Grove, Mo.; and Thomas Bannister, 38, of Cahokia, Ill., Fayette County deputy coroner Johnny Leach said Sunday.

Daigneau had fled by the time police arrived, Bryant said.

State police said a Lancaster police officer noticed Daigneau's truck in Lancaster and followed it. Before the officer got out of his cruiser, Daigneau shot himself in the head as he sat in his truck, police said.

Jackson offered the sermon at "Magic Johnson has gone from saving games to saving lives," Jackson said of the Los Angeles Lakers star's decision Thursday to go public with his infection to educate others about the deadly disease.

"His announcement was like a hole had been shot through our souls," Jackson said. "It was a dramatic way to get the nation's attention, to get the

With shaving cream smeared all over their heads, Travis Lane and Jonathan Gerdel waited eagerly as children approached with Cheetos in hand. Many of these children had disabilities, but this didn't inhibit them from turning the two boys into "Sticky Heads."

This game was just one of many taking place at the "Parent Contact Training Weekend" at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome Saturday and Sunday.

The weekend was sponsored by Families Together, Inc., a non-profit, statewide organization that serves families that include a child with a disability. The program's mission is to provide families the security of belonging to a group of caring individuals with similar goals, challenges and needs.

The training weekend was designed for parents, their disabled children and other siblings. Many of these conferences happen throughout the year and draw families from numerous areas around the state.

Lane, who usually attends the conference in Lawrence with his disabled sister, traveled to Manhattan with the Gerdel family. Patty Gerdel, executive director of Families Together, Inc., said her involvement with the network stemmed from her 21-year-old son, who also participated in the training weekend.

Jonathan Gerdel, 11, said, "I love hanging out at hotels and meeting many children. We have fun partici-

State-of-the-art equipment used

Vet Med uses ultrasound machine to diagnose injuries

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

Ask Nolan Ryan or Joe Montana or any other athlete with "tennis elbow" — an injured tendon is a nagging, painful, persistent, slow-to-heal and easily recurring kind of problem.

And tearing the tendon fibers that connect muscles to bones is not only common among athletes but animals as well.

About eight months ago, K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine acquired an Acuson 128 ultrasound machine, which is considered the "gold standard" of ultrasound equipment. The clinical sciences department and the veterinary medical teaching hospital are using state-of-the-art technology to diagnose tendon injuries and other kinds of soft tissue and internal organ problems.

K-State is only one of four U.S. veterinary colleges to have an Acuson 128 and the only veterinary service in the region with this equipment.

The veterinarians at K-State and their students usually refer about 20 animals a week to radiology for an ultrasound examination. They might see a snake with a cardiac arrhythmia, a cat with a liver ailment or a horse with a leg injury.

Dr. Cynthia Godshalk, professor of veterinary medicine, said radiographs, which require X-rays and ultrasound, are like comparing a black-and-white photo to television, the only difference is the action.

Radiographs give a still image of the bone, the surrounding soft tissue, and air, but the soft tissues appear homogeneous, and the soft tissue and fluid cannot be differentiated.

With ultrasound technology, however, a diagnostician can scan soft tissue or the internal organs of the body while they are working and at the same time study the image on a video screen, she said.

The scanning technology is based on reflected sound waves like the locator system used by dolphins and aboard submarines. The acoustic waves can be bounced off an object, including an organ, muscle or tendon, and the reflected sound creates the image.

Godshalk said by using ultrasound, a diagnostician can see the differences between soft tissue and the surround-

Ultrasound helpful to Vet-Med school

■ Since K-State's Veterinary Medicine school has acquired ultrasound equipment, it is one of four U.S. veterinary colleges to have this equipment and the only veterinary service in the region with the equipment.

■ Ultrasound technology, similar to an X-ray that shows movement, allows a diagnostician to see:

- differences between soft tissue and fluids
- differences between normal and inflamed tissue
- blood flow in vessels and the chambers of the heart

ing fluid or between normal and inflamed tissue.

Dr. Earl Gaughan, professor of veterinary medicine, said an ultrasound examination is a harmless, non-invasive procedure, frightening only to an occasional nervous patient who may require a mild sedative before remaining still for the scan.

"We usually only have to use a sedative for horses," he said.

Gaughan said there is no ionizing radiation as there is with X-rays.

"It is a marvelous tool for abdominal and cardiac evaluations in small and large animals," Gaughan said, "as well as for evaluating musculo-skeletal abnormalities."

He said by using ultrasound, veterinarians can diagnose tendon injuries in horses much earlier. Treatment can be prescribed sooner, so the down time is reduced, which is an especially important consideration for athletic horses.

"Tendon damage is very devastating to an athletic career," he said. "It can be a very nagging injury, but with ultrasound we can say with confidence when a horse can go back to work."

Laurie Heeb, fourth year student in veterinary medicine, said ultrasound is an effective tool.

"It can tell you a whole lot of things about the animal," she said.

The Acuson 128 unit at the veterinary hospital is a refurbished demonstration unit. If purchased today, it would cost about $250,000, including its $45,000 color Doppler capability, Godshalk said.

Zonkers Quayle's verbal dukes with Trudeau goofy

Vice President Dan Quayle certainly has a curious agenda these days. While his boss globe trots in the name of the New World Order, Quayle whines about a cartoon, living up to virtually everyone's expectations of him. Recently, Quayle was outraged over Garry Trudeau's "Doonesbury" comic strip that is based on unfounded allegations Quayle used cocaine and Quaaludes. Quayle called Trudeau's jab a personal vendetta and said the allegations have been investigated and discredited. The allegations of drug use by Quayle will be raised in an upcoming two-week series. There is no reason for Quayle to make a big stink out of the issue. When the issue was raised during the 1988 presidential election by a federal prisoner serving for drug smuggling and bombing offenses, the Drug Enforcement Agency found the charges were groundless. Also, Trudeau's strip is known for its liberalism and satire, not for uncovering scandals. Last week Quayle told the Associated Press, "I don't mind a good political fight," when asked about Trudeau's strip. The Louisiana gubernatorial race between David Duke and Edwin Edwards is a political fight — not Quayle versus Doonesbury. Quayle already has an image problem with the American people. He is poked at for his youth, tactless statements and for ducking issues. If taking on a cartoon is what he calls a "good political fight," he doesn't aid his image — he gives Trudeau more ammunition.

'We must remember'

RON ZERRER

GUEST

Ron Zerrer is a graduate student in history and an U.S. Army veteran.

What have you done for the American Commonwealth? Unlike most people who only care for their personal well being, veterans have sacrificed as few people in today's United States will ever have to. Because of that fact, we should mourn Veterans Day.

Let us recall the war dead, wounded and maimed, and forever lost. We should mourn the suffering millions of men and women have experienced over the years, from all lands and nations, because we all share one commonality: Bullets and bombs tear our bodies apart in the same grotesque manner.

We must recall our war dead and the millions who returned scared both physically and mentally. We must remember if only to recall that war is not a football game between arch rivals. It is pain and loneliness. War invites a desolation of the soul that festers in our minds and creates an uncaring emptiness.

We must remember veterans and their fidelity to one another, because one another was all they had in a terribly violent little world. We remember the placid acts of humanity so out of place in a maelstrom of barbarity.

We remember them, their freckled faces, eager eyes, proud jaws and emblazoned passion. We remember that with each name on every tombstone, in every cemetery of every village, town or city, an entire world was shaken or destroyed when they were killed. Their worlds were like your own: worlds of family — daughters and sons, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters.

I remember friends lost to me forever like an old man's youth. I remember Danny Hartke and his American dream of a fishing boat with which to chase the shrimp. There is Larry, who once whispered to me that the heaviest burden he ever bore was 16 sets of dogtags from a valley in Vietnam.

What is the meaning of their deaths? What is the meaning of their suffering?

Did they suffer and die for hunger, homelessness or the excruciatingly humiliating lines of the unemployed? What kind of nation currently lures the lower classes into the military while effectively releasing higher classes from a comparable social duty? What kind of nation turns it back on its most disenfranchised and allows them to face the crush of poverty alone or nearly alone as social programs are curtailed or eliminated?

The challenge for us all is to realize the society that our veterans envisioned — a society characterized by a sense of justice in which the weak would be cared for, the hungry fed and the shelterless housed.

Perhaps the best way we can remember Veterans Day is to work — work at making this country the heaven they so innocently believed it was they were serving.

Thou naughty varlet!—Dogberry. Much Ado About Nothing, IV, ii.

Power brokers, shotgun shells and confusion

We pass the empty shotgun shell around the living room. Shawn Bruce has the whiskey bottle. He refills the shell with booze and passes it on to the next person, who shoves the blown-open end up a nostril, leans back and snorts the whole damn shot. Silence.

It is the evening of the primary election. We have received the call from Ann Woodbury. She said 577 people had voted for Bruce in the presidential election, which, while not enough to put him on the run-off ballot, allowed us to entertain the notion that we were POWER BROKERS.

Power. Low lives such as Bruce, Big Kev, AJ and myself are happy to drink to that word whether the power is real or not. Wingert and McClaskey will be in the run-off election. One of them will follow in the austere footsteps of Todd Johnson and Todd Heitschmidt. For a few moments, we imagine we have the power to swing our 577 votes for one of the candidates. Of course, those 577 people voted out of confusion. They won't remember for whom they voted, nor will they vote in the run-off. This doesn't, however, stop us from celebrating.

The shotgun shell comes around filled all the way up from the metal. Running nieces and runny noses Jackie McClaskey is talking to her campaign manager and Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life. They are just past the curtain inside the back room of The Outback at Last Chance. The room has been reserved for the McClaskey campaign's victory party. Perfunctory hellos.

Behind us, Jackie's niece is bending over backwards in her chair, shouting, "My Jackie! My Jackie! My Jackie!"

The candidate says the Collegian photographer took a great picture of her and her niece embracing. My nose is running. I wipe it on my sleeve. My entire head stings. "They also took a picture of me taking a shot," Jackie says.

"Cool," I say. "How many votes didja get?"

"Nine hundred and fifty-eight. Half as many as Fred," she says. "I hope they don't run that picture. They probably will, though."

Her niece is running around the bar. "My Jackie! My Jackie! My Jackie!"

The good ol' boy network

Fred's victory party is sans Fred by the time we arrive. AJ bailed our Power Brokerage, also. Too many politicians, too many greases. Amy Miller, Fred's campaign manager, explains that she sent him home because he has a long week ahead of him. Everyone left seems drunk. We are given the last drops of beer. Bruce settles in the couch and talks politics with Miller. Big Kev and I move to the kitchen. I recognize someone from an old English class.

We are not loved here, so we hobnob with Wingert's aides, knowing that they have to be polite to us. They also are under the Power Broker illusion. I am told why Fred would make a better student body president. Besides us, there is only one person who is not a member of Senate, but everybody's partisan. This is a den of insiders.

"Fred's father's been in the Kansas Legislature, so he has clout on a state level. That would be good for K-State," I am told.

My dad was a representative, too.

Also, Fred's dad owns land adjacent to the old Skoog/Ogg homestead along Highway 56 north of Ottawa. I don't know whether Fred grew up there or not. My dad spent his summers there as a kid. I've been out there before and have inferred from the stories that George Wingert's reputation in the Statehouse is not such that his son would have a great deal of pull with other representatives.

I mention this.

"But Fred's not a very political person. Jackie is," someone else says. "Of course," I say. "Fred is, too. At the debate in the Union courtyard, when Fred was asked to say something nice about Bruce, he kindly patronized Bruce and called him the 'Fred Phelps of this campaign.' That's the answer of an opportunist and a deft politician. Jackie seems more capable to me of acting in a non-political way in a non-political situation. I have my doubts about that ability in Fred."

There is no more beer, no more booze. I venture that more has been drunk by fewer people at this party.

Bruce agrees. We leave, admiring the Wingert campaign's ability to schmooze.

Disintegration

On the drive back, we lament our loss. The freak power campaign was

Grow up, Jason

Editor,
This is in response to "Jason's picks" of student body president.

Seeing that the current candidates are so woefully lacking in their ability to not be slimy, I was wondering when you, Jason, are going to get off your dead butt and attempt to make some improvements around K-State.

Your columns are usually amusing in their retro-sixties, semi-stoned, artsy cynic way. For as much bitching as you do about the University, I would think anyone promoting change or a potentially policy-changing event like an election would be refreshing to you.

Seven K-Staters were willing to lay a big chunk of their time and reputation on the line to make K-State a little more pleasant for students. If they make a little mistake, the whole student body howls. It can't be very pleasant to have personal life dragged out in public just because you'd like to see better parking, more class sections.

I'd like you to show me the one instance where you stuck your neck out to do something positive for K-State, and maybe I'll quit bagging on you for being an apathetic, impotent excuse of a political analyst in your article.

Maybe you didn't hit K-State with a silver spoon in your mouth and a nice suit in your closet, but to rate a candidate on the assumption that he is spoiled, therefore, unworthy, is shallow. Grow up. It's good PR to have nice signs and shirts as part of a successful campaign.

I'd rather vote for the guy that will definitely go to Topeka with a lobby (and a vengeance) with our problems than a million clean-cut preppies who think of the office as a resume builder.

Slime column nauseating

Editor,
When Jason Hamilton plastered his opinions of all the student body presidential candidates on Page 4 of the Collegian, he showed his own level of sliminess. Jason, as for you and Suzie, tell us all how you both rate your maturity. To me, anyone who has the audacity to laugh and ridicule individuals who are interested in bettering the lives of 20,000 students, has got to be the biggest slime of all.

Had you been a good enough columnist to give valid reasons for your vilifying of the candidates, the article might not have been so nauseating. What exactly constitutes a slime? The fact that an individual runs for office on an overused campaign ploy or chooses to publicize his or her candidacy shouldn't be grounds for an attack.

As for the poster issue you say is so important, how do you justify writing a half page of ignorant, petty remarks about six individuals, whom when compared to you, have infinitely more tact? It seems the half page you used to promote yourself isn't any different than what the candidates have done.

It's really too bad that, on a day when voting and conquering apathy is most important, we were faced with reading crap like your article, which just possibly contributes to a low representation of voters.

I hope I'm right about your sliminess and everyone else feels the same way I do. Whatever we do, we shouldn't have to read slime. To me, slime is your article.

Cats bury final streak, win 37-7

Road skid ends at 30 games; plenty of heroes make sure of it

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

AMES, Iowa — Thirties are no longer wild at K-State. The Wildcat football team shed the final link to its less-than-storied football past Saturday, ending a 30-game road losing streak with a 37-7 win over Iowa State in Cyclone Stadium.

"It was in the back of our minds, sure," linebacker Brooks Barta said of the streak, which began following a 20-17 win at Missouri in 1985. "We knew we had a chance to get rid of it this week, and we took care of business."

In posting the 30-point win and thus ending the 30-game road skid, the Cats added a pair of 30s to the one that started the program's revival in earnest — a win over North Texas in 1989 that snapped the school's 30-game winless streak.

"This was a fun game, and things were clicking just like you'd want them to," quarterback Paul Watson said. He threw for three touchdowns and ran for another.

Things clicked from beginning to end for K-State, which finally was able to mix the run and the pass effectively in the same game.

"That's one of the things we've been trying to get to all season," Watson said of the offensive balance, which led to 231 yards gained rushing and another 209 gained through the air. "Today, we got both going."

"When you're throwing effectively, teams have to worry about the pass. That opens up the run, and then teams are worried about that."

In the opening touchdown march of the game, the Cats were successful predominantly on the ground, with Eric Gallon gaining 52 of the march's 80 yards. Gallon ended the day with 128 yards on 34 carries.

Gallon's previous best in a Big Eight game had been a 70-yard effort in a loss to Colorado.

"This was a lot better (than previous efforts) because I haven't really done something like this against a Big Eight team," Gallon said.

And while Gallon's efforts led to Curtis Madden's one-yard burst for the first score, Watson's arm and Michael Smith's hands led to three of the remaining four touchdowns the Cats were left to register.

Smith's three TD catches were the most by a K-State receiver in a single game since John Williams had three against Austin Peay State in 1987. Smith has now eclipsed the career touchdown total of 10 set by Henry Childs, and did so on a day that was significant for several reasons.

"It felt good to finally get in there a few times," Smith said of his "hat trick," which enabled him to equal his 1991 season TD total in a single afternoon of work. "And it was especially good to get there in a win and a win on the road."

"We were finally able to get that one off of our backs."

And while Watson was getting the ball to Smith on touchdown tosses of 3, 11 and 8 yards, he was ringing up far more impressive numbers than just those. He ended the game with all of K-State's 209 yards passing on a 20-of-27 day, and rushed for 50 more on seven carries.

Watson was the team's second-leading rusher, and his most impressive carry was a 15-yard, third-quarter TD scamper in which he broke free from a pile at the 13-yard-line and drug three defenders the final three yards into the end zone.

"It was part of the game plan," Watson said of the team's reliance on his legs as well as his arm. "If you remember last season, you know we had some success with the quarterback draw."

And while Watson, Gallon and mates were romping all over Jack Trice Field en route to the team's biggest Big Eight road win since a 46-0 thrashing of Kansas in 1955 at Lawrence, the defense was bouncing back from a poor early showing to dominate the Cyclones.

Iowa State did not register its initial first down of the second half until just 7:02 remained in the game. K-State's defense held the home team without a first down over a 23:54 stretch from the final seconds of the first half until midway through the fourth period.

That's more than one-third of the game.

"Our defense kept coming and coming today," said nose tackle Evan Simpson, who recorded the initial hit on a fourth-and-one play midway through the third quarter that enabled K-State to snuff a Cyclone drive and protect what was then a 21-7 lead. "That hit kind of shook them up and took them out of the game."

"And we didn't give them a chance to regroup."

In reality, K-State failed to give Iowa State an inch after the Cyclone drive that tied the game early at 7-7.

Iowa State quarterback Marv Seiler dives for the end zone late in the fourth quarter as K-State nose tackle Darrell Harbert tries to stop him. The Wildcats limited the Cyclones to 124 rushing yards for the afternoon.

No doubt about this one

Walden impressed with Cats' effort against his team

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

AMES, Iowa — "thirtysomething" — both the TV series and a pair of K-State football losing streaks — exists no more.

That's no surprise to Iowa State coach Jim Walden, who saw his injury-riddled team manhandled by its guests Saturday in Cyclone Stadium.

"We just got beat by a good football team," said Walden, who saw his team fall to 1-3-1 in the Big Eight and 3-5-1 overall. "They executed better than we did and just have a better group of players to play with."

Although Walden was impressed by what he saw from the men in purple and white, K-State coach Bill Snyder did find fault — even though he appeared to be searching for something negative to harp on — in his team's performance in an area or two.

"We punted more than we wanted to and didn't get enough first downs today," Snyder said. "It's not a matter of what you do on the field but a matter of how you do it and how you execute your plays."

K-State head coach Bill Snyder found little to criticize in the Cats' 37-7 win — their largest margin of victory on the road in 22 years.

"We need more poise and need to start eliminating our penalties."

Indeed, K-State was flagged eight times for 70 yards on the day, but Snyder's offensive and defensive groups, as he later conceded, had a rather solid day at the office.

"Overall, I felt the kids were fundamentally sound and executed well," Snyder said.

K-State's offensive execution — to the tune of 440 total yards — impressed Cyclone free safety Mark Doubrava. "The offense kept us off balance," he said. "In the first half, we had a lot

Missouri rebounds after slow start in season opener

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. — It was a long way to go for a home game.

The K-State hockey team opened its season against Missouri with a weekend doubleheader Saturday and Sunday at the George Bode Jr. Ice Arena.

HOCKEY

Missouri controlled the first game after a slow start, using a late goal to cap a 6-4 victory.

Despite the loss, team captain Tony Dicola was pleased with the team's effort.

"Overall, I'm happy with what happened out there," Dicola said. "For the first time, it wasn't bad. Our lines haven't skated together in the past. We had only one practice that the lines worked together."

For Missouri, it also was the first game of the season, but the Tigers found their continuity a little faster.

The Tigers controlled the puck early in the game, but it was K-State that scored first. Chris Dunitz gave the Wildcats a 1-0 lead by punching a shot through a cluster of players in front of Missouri's goal 12 minutes into the match.

But the lead didn't last for long. Just 45 seconds later, Missouri tied the score. Then things got worse for the Cats. While Pat Steiner was sitting on the penalty bench for two minutes, Missouri scored on the power play with 14 seconds remaining in the opening period.

In the second period, the Tigers outplayed the Cats, scoring three goals to build their lead to 5-1. The Tigers struck twice in 22 seconds at the start of the middle period to gain a big advantage in the match.

After the Tigers' fifth goal, which came in the middle of the period, K-State started to play better. The Cats put more pressure on Missouri's defenders and had a 3-on-1 break late in the period. But the Tiger defender was able to get his stick on the puck and knocked the shot away.

K-State made a run in the final period. The Cats started more aggressively, which resulted in two scoring chances. Five minutes into the period, Rick Seckinger scored the Cats' second goal of the match.

The Cats continued their effort to get back into the game. But a penalty against Dicola, one of eight two-minute penalties against K-State, stopped the Cats' attack.

After the Cats returned to full strength, K-State started its final charge. Goals by Yuichiro Namba with 2:30 remaining and Steven Stroud one minute later cut Missouri's lead to 5-4.

With 45 seconds left in the game, K-State took goalie Bill Hudson out of the game and replaced him with an additional attacker. The Cats increased the pressure, but lost the puck in the final seconds to Missouri, which took advantage of the empty goal to score the last point of the match.

Dicola said the lack of team-play was the main reason for the loss.

"There a lot of individuals who are trying to be a team," Dicola said. "But we're not. We have to get more together and work as a team."

"Defensively we didn't play that well. You should take the (offense) guys at the blue line, but we let them skate in. That gave them more of an opportunity to shoot."

Dicola said Missouri, which had only 10 penalty minutes, had a good squad with a goalie who saved some good shots, but he thought the second game would have a different result.

Cowboys try to give Sooners help

Orange Bowl bid still up for grabs

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Oklahoma State, not in the habit of doing Oklahoma any favors, did its best to put the Sooners right back in the Orange Bowl picture.

In the end, however, it all went for naught because of one of the most remarkable rolls any coach ever made of the dice. Colorado's Bill McCartney gambled and won.

With six seconds left, Robbie James threw a 20-yard touchdown pass to Christian Fauria on a fake field goal Saturday, rescuing the Buffaloes from a killer of an upset and giving them a 16-12 victory over still-winless Oklahoma State.

"However long I've been coaching

— 25 years or so, I guess — that's the gutsiest call I've ever seen," Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones said of McCartney's bold move on third-and-10. "A field goal will win the game."

McCartney, still hopeful of a third straight Orange Bowl trip, said his play was not the huge risk many assumed because James was instructed to throw the ball away if the receiver was not open. Then on fourth down, the Buffs would have tried the field goal.

On Colorado's final drive, backup quarterback Vance Joseph scrambled on fourth-and-14, long enough to find fullback James Hill for a 17-yard completion to the Cowboys' 30.

"I guess clean living triumphed again with Bill," Jones said. "He's really a nicer guy than I am, always has been."

Oklahoma State fell to 0-8-1, 0-4-1 in the Big Eight.

The victory kept No. 16 Colorado in contention for the Big Eight title and the Orange Bowl with No. 11 Nebraska, which had a rather remarkable day itself in a 59-23 victory over KU.

The Huskers fell behind KU 17-0 in Lawrence and seemed destined to lose to the Jayhawks for the first time since 1968. But with star running back Derek Brown on the bench injured, a redshirt freshman named Calvin Jones came in and rushed for a school-record 294 yards and a Big Eight-record six touchdowns in less than three quarters.

"As far as tackling the ball carrier, it was our poorest performance of the year," KU coach Glen Mason said. "That was just not our defense out there. If it was, I didn't recognize it and I hope I never see it again."

If Oklahoma State had won, No. 18 Oklahoma would have zoomed right into the Orange Bowl picture because Plocher, Lusnic 2nd at regional

The play of freshmen tennis players Mareke Plocher and Karin Lusnic have given K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau a reason to smile when thinking about the future.

On Friday, Lusnic and Plocher defeated Erica Kolijanin and Sarah Muganaini of Brigham Young 6-3, 6-2 in the semifinals of the Rolex Central Region Championships.

"I'm glad to see our doubles are improving," Bietau said. "The progress we make in that area now will be a big factor to how successful we are in the spring season."

But the stay in the semis did not last long. Plocher and Lusnic lost to Lisa Savaterra and Ruth Ann Stevens of Utah 6-2, 6-1 in Saturday's action.

In singles, Michele Riniker made it to the final eight of the tournament before losing to top-seeded Christina Sirianni of Oklahoma State 6-2, 6-4.

Riniker said the match was one of those that just got away from her. "I played well, and at one point I was even up 2-1," she said. "Then I was down 3-2, then when I looked up it was 5-2. I didn't give it away. She just played great tennis."

Bietau agreed with Riniker's assessment of the match.

"Michele had a great tournament," Bietau said. "She put together some things that she's been talking about for a long time."

The Department of Animal Sciences and Industry's Livestock and Meats Judging Teams are going to Kansas City, Mo., for the 61st Annual American Royal Livestock and Horse Show, Nov. 8-23.

Meats team member Brian Dunn, junior in animal sciences and industry, said contest preparation in the form of practice sessions, or "workouts," has been going on since before the fall semester began.

"We started workouts a week before school started and now have continued the regular workouts," he said. "But now, we will be concentrating specifically on the American Royal Contest."

Meats team coach John Unruh, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said the American Royal is one of the most prestigious contests for the team to enter. Last year, the K-State team finished third overall, and Unruh said this year's team is also extremely competitive.

"Success is not necessarily measured by the placing but the team members' personal improvement and goal achievement in meats judging,"

Unruh said.

Another area of K-State involvement at the 1991 American Royal is the Student Ambassador program, which replaced the American Royal Queen competition in 1988. One female and one male are chosen to promote the American Royal and the agricultural industry in media, civic and business groups and student and

The rooms will have to be completely rebuilt, but the contents will be difficult to replace, Liotta said. The schools' insurance company has yet to give an estimate, but a definite amount will be given after demolition of the damaged area. Reconstruction of the building will begin when the estimates from the insurance company are available.

"The contents of the building exceeded well over $100,000 in damage," Liotta said.

Supplies such as music books, instruments and chairs were destroyed in the blaze. The storage rooms contained desks and other furniture for the rest of the school, some of which has been saved, Liotta said. Old files from Lucky High School, which has been closed for several years, were kept in file cabinets in the storage rooms, but no one has had a chance to go through them yet to see if they can be salvaged.

"The music teacher, Shelly Manges, is going to have to start from scratch, she had seventeen years of work in her office," Liotta said.

The K-State Music Department has offered instruments for the school to use and an elementary band teacher from Manhattan Public Schools offered some of his personal music books, said Manges, music teacher at Manhattan Catholic Schools.

Music classes will be conducted in the audio-visual room after all the equipment has been removed and the class will make do with what is available.

"The other teachers decorated it up for me," Manges said.

School was canceled Friday, but will resume today.

unsuccessful, but we didn't spend a dime on it, so, dem's da berries.

We summarized the evening. People pretended admirably they were glad to see us. McClaskey's people were less frightened of us and were sincere in their desire to win the campaign. At The Outback, I got none of the weird Wingert vibes. Perhaps it's just paranoia, but I find it hard to trust Fred's Dick Van Dyke smile and eerie casual demeanor. All politicians have a few vials of snake oil to sell you, but most elements of the Wingert campaign seem positively greased.

I'll vote for Jackie McClaskey Wednesday, although she's every inch the insider Fred is. As Senate vice chairwoman, she hasn't done much. No issues were ever discussed by either candidate. Perception is the key to this campaign, neither candidate having ever given any other criteria for voting.

Student body presidents don't really do anything, however, except sit on the stage at Landon Lectures and wear suits, we decided in the car.

Shawn passed the shotgun shell around again, and we tried to forget the evening we played Politics, a game worthy of the Parker Brothers.

don't like to do that, but it's my job—it's tough."

Bogina spoke to about 45 people in the K-State Union Big Eight Room, many with specific questions in mind for the senator.

One concerned student asked if the Senate was going to help fund an expansion of Farrell Library since the student body referendum passed by an overwhelming 97 percent.

"I'd say we'll back you, but with what?" Bogina said.

That was an all too common answer to many of the questions the senator fielded that day. Simply put, Bogina said there is not enough money to go around.

Sooners

The Sooners were manhandling defensively deficient Missouri 56-16. With Mike Gaddis rushing for 217 yards and four touchdowns, the Sooners showed everybody why Missouri has the worst rushing defense among 106 Division I-A teams.

Oklahoma exploited the Tigers' feeble run defense for 428 rushing yards and Gaddis tied a Missouri opponent record with his four touchdowns.

The Tigers, which fell to 3-5-1, are doomed to a losing record for the eighth straight year.

"We have not gotten better over the last two weeks," Missouri coach Bob Stull said. "We've gotten worse."

John Niemann, junior in agribusiness and newly elected K-State agriculture ambassador, is Kansas' male candidate in the American Royal Ambassador competition. He said the difference between the two ambassador programs is the time factor.

Several students will also be exhibiting livestock, and faculty and staff members are helping organize youth livestock shows.

ISU

of third-down situations, and we didn't stop them.

"They ran the ball more than we expected, and they executed very well."

There's that word again: "execute." Walden used it, Snyder used it, DouBrava used it, and K-State did it — all day long.

As a result, the 30-game losing streak went by the boards.

"I'm pleased with our win and performance and especially happy for our kids," Snyder said. "The win was very important, not necessarily because it was ISU, but because it was a win on the road."

On offense, touchdowns came by land and by air. In fact, the win over the Cyclones marked the first time since the second game of the season (a home rout of Idaho State) that the Cats had multi-TD games both on the ground and via the passing game.

Eric Gallon rushed for 128 yards — his best effort against a Big Eight opponent — and Michael Smith had a career-best, three touchdown catches.

Smith said the two accomplishments came as no coincidence.

"With Eric playing as well as he did, it helps the receivers out a lot, because the defense is really looking for him," Smith said. "And it makes us an even tougher team to beat."

In grabbing the win that moved the team to 5-4 overall and 2-3 in the Big Eight, K-State moved one step closer to a finish above .500 (the first since 1982) and possibly the school's first seven-win season since 1954.

Also, in so doing, K-State made a pair of close losses to Nebraska and Colorado — losses that will keep the Wildcats at least one game short of the necessary six wins against Division IA teams required for a bowl berth — even more difficult to swallow.

"It sheds light back on those two ballgames," Snyder said. "And it brings back the pain of those two ballgames."

Professor returns from lecture in Cairo

Wassom discussed corn breeding for drought tolerance

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

A K-State professor has recently returned from a trip to Cairo, Egypt, where he spoke at the Egyptian Annual Maize workshop.

Clyde Wassom, professor in agronomy, was invited to a four-day workshop to give a keynote lecture on corn breeding for drought tolerance. Study of corn breeding has played a major role in his 30-year tenure in the agronomy department. Wassom based his speech on the fact that the success and yield of a crop depends highly on the genetics and environmental effects.

Corn grown in the central United States has good results due to rainfall, soil composition, warm temperatures and an adequate amount of light. In Egypt, there is a lack of rainfall which influences the need to do genetic work so the corn will be more apt to thrive in the dry, sandy soil conditions.

Wassom has found there is corn grown in Egypt and places of similar dry conditions that is of equal quality to that grown in the Corn Belt of the United States.

"Egypt gets less than two inches of rain per year," he said. "It is the ideal place to study drought tolerance. You're almost guaranteed there won't be any rain. Whenever I try to do a drought study here, as soon as I start, it rains."

Wassom

Throughout Wassom's stay at K-State he has traveled all over the world, including places such as Turkey, various countries in South America and Nepal. His recent trip made this the fourth time he's been to Egypt—his first Egyptian tour was in 1977. Wassom said the most interesting thing he learned was the differences in sizes of the Egyptian farms.

"Egypt is a land of contrasts," he said. "I've noticed that there have been a lot of changes made, like the first time I went, there were many small farms of five or six acres. This last time I saw large farms of up to 16,000 acres with 25 irrigation units put to use on land that is as clean as the sand in a child's sand box."

Wassom would like to continue the study of corn breeding and the travel that comes with it.

ASIA focuses on culture

November declared as Asian American Awareness Month

CRAIG KREUTZER
Collegian Reporter

A new group for K-State's Asian-American students is sponsoring Asian American Awareness Month with events beginning this week.

Events, each focusing on a different aspect of Asian culture, will run through the third week of November.

ASIA President Jason Ly, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said the month is to draw attention to the new group.

"The original idea was to gather interest for ASIA, to attract people to the group," Ly said. "But, we also wanted to share Asian culture."

Asian-American Students for Intercultural Awareness was formed to offer K-State's Asian-American students an opportunity to meet others from similar backgrounds.

Ly said before coming to K-State, he had little contact with other Asian-Americans.

"While growing up, I didn't have any other friends whose background was similar to mine," Ly said.

Paul Bridges, freshman in computer science, handles the group's public relations. He said being a member teaches him more about Asian cultures.

"I'm half-Korean, but I'm basically ignorant about Korean culture," he said. "In ASIA, I am able to learn about other oriental people who are in the same boat."

But interaction with each other isn't the only reason ASIA began.

Ly said one of the group's goals is countering stereotypes people have about Asian-American students.

"There's a perception that most Asian-American students are loners—they don't talk much," Ly said.

For more information about dates and times of the events, call Jason Ly at 532-2091.

Survivors blame fire on wiring

Grandfather clause allows now illegal wiring in older trailers

PAT OBLEY
City/Government Editor

Editor's note: The story below is the first of a series investigating the Sept. 5 Keats trailer fire, in which three people were killed. This installment deals with charges of faulty wiring and rental inspection brought forward by Anthony and Scott Moss, the survivors of the fire.

Anthony and Scott Moss, speaking for the first time since their rented trailer home burned, claim faulty inspection and illegal wiring are to blame for the deaths of Julie Clarke and her two children.

The Mosses came forward after repeated allegations of wrong doing by acquaintances and co-workers.

"According to the report we got from the (Riley County Rural) fire department, the fire was electrical," Scott Moss said. "The fire started with the wiring in the walls. The trailer was an old trailer with all-aluminum wiring, which is illegal."

KEATS FIRE

Kenneth Klabunde, K-State professor of chemistry, said it is theoretically possible for aluminum to burn if the temperature is high enough.

"If aluminum begins to burn, it will generate even more heat," Klabunde said.

As a result, a chain reaction could occur, accelerating the speed with which the fire would burn, Klabunde said.

Anthony Moss said Clarke, who was his fiancée, her children and Scott Moss had moved into the trailer seven days before the fire. Subsequently, furniture was not in place, and dozens of cardboard boxes were stacked in the trailer's hallway the night of the fire.

He said upon discovery of the fire, which originated in the kitchen, he awakened Scott Moss, who was sleeping in a nearby room. By that time, the fire had spread to the boxes in the hallway, making the corridor impassable. The bedroom Clarke and her children were sleeping in was at the end of the hallway.

After attempts to re-enter the trailer wrapped in wet blankets failed, the Mosses, with the aid of a neighbor, tried to cut a hole in the trailer's wall, Scott Moss said.

As a last hope, the Mosses and the neighbor tried to get in through a bathroom window. By then, the trailer was completely in flames, Scott Moss said.

RCFRD Chief Del Petty investigated the fire and filed a fire report stating the cause of the fire was electrical in origin. Petty said he could not comment on the presence of aluminum wiring.

"I don't know, and I don't have any legal authority to say," Petty said.

According to Curtis Hort of Tri-County Management, the firm that leased the trailer, there are regulations against aluminum wiring in new trailers. But a grandfather clause exists that allows leasing of trailers built when aluminum wiring was legal.

Anthony Moss also claimed the smoke alarm in the trailer did not activate, and he charged Tri-County with faulty inspection.

"Before we moved in, a guy came out and went through the trailer to check things out," he said.

"He went through the bedrooms and bathroom and said 'This looks OK,' then he left."

Hort said he conducted the inspection.

"Their trailer was in really good shape," Hort said. "In fact, it was in better shape than most of the places we manage."

"I really wasn't all that worried about that trailer catching fire."

Although he conceded he doesn't check all the smoke alarms when he inspects, Hort said he remembered checking the Mosses' alarm.

"I'm 6-foot-1, so as you can tell, I can reach the ceiling of most trailers. I remember pushing the test button on that smoke alarm in that trailer, and it beeped."

Jimmy Grimm is comforted by his daughter and son Monday at the dedication of a memorial to his son, Air Force Capt. William Grimm, near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. William Grimm was the only K-State graduate killed in action during Operation Desert Storm.

Tree planted for graduate who served, died in Operation Desert Storm

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

K-State students, family members and fellow Air Force ROTC cadets gathered at 11:11 a.m., Monday at the Kansas State University Vietnam Veterans' Memorial, to remember Capt. William D. Grimm, a K-State alumnus killed in action in Operation Desert Storm.

The Silver Wings/Arnold Air Society Veterans' Day ceremony dedicated a tree to Grimm, who died with 13 of his comrades in a mission to save Marines during the Persian Gulf War.

Rain trickled down the leaves of the tiny tree planted near the Memorial and beads of water formed on top of the bronze plaque below while Beth Bradley, president of Silver Wings, read an article to open the ceremony.

"As we see people in the Armed Forces doing their jobs and giving their lives for the safety of others, we think they deserve recognition," Bradley said.

William Grimm's father, Jimmy Grimm, said he is proud of what his son did for his country.

"We lost a good boy," Jimmy said. "Veterans do things to sacrifice their lives, and unfortunately, we had to give that sacrifice."

"We loved him, but we also know he loved the Air Force and his comrades and was proud of his country," he said.

Water-saturated yellow ribbons decorating the surrounding trees signified the pride felt by fellow ROTC students attending the ceremony as they bowed their heads in a prayer lead by Don Fallon, retired Air Force colonel and director of religious activities at K-State.

"I firmly believe God's acceptance and love for us is greater than brokenness we feel in our lives," Fallon said.

He said when death comes suddenly and violently, the emptiness, hurt and anger can't be replaced, but to know a community is willing to console those suffering is important.

"We must also remember the families of Vietnam veterans and those who are still suffering from the turmoil of it," Fallon said.

"As we remember William, let us celebrate all that he stood for. God's love and care is greater than death and let this be a reminder of hope, that people of all diversities can someday live in a world of peace," Fallon said.

The tree dedicated to Grimm was donated by Wal-Mart and planted last spring by Silver Wings.

Grimm was a native of Manhattan and graduated from K-State in 1986.

AIDS up among heterosexuals

Awareness heightened by Magic Johnson's diagnosis, doctor says

By the Associated Press

GENEVA — Heterosexual sex is the method of infection for 75 percent of the people with the AIDS virus worldwide and is increasingly the pathway for the virus in Western countries, the World Health Organization said Monday.

The majority of the heterosexually infected people are in the developing world, particularly in Africa, and this group is still only a small percentage of the total AIDS cases in North America and Europe, the Geneva-based agency said in an extensive report.

The U.N. group says up to 5,000 people are infected with AIDS each day around the world, and officials fear an increase in pregnant women infecting their babies.

Awareness about heterosexual transmission of the AIDS virus was heightened after basketball star Magic Johnson announced Thursday he had the HIV virus and said he had no homosexual affairs.

In the United States, 3 percent of men and 34 percent of women contracted the virus from a person of the opposite sex, according to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta.

"It is not easy to change sexual behavior, but hopefully with more people like Magic Johnson coming out and talking about their illness, everyone will realize they are at risk and take more care," said Dr. Michael Merson, head of the U.N. health agency's AIDS program.

Merson said large-scale effectiveness tests of possible AIDS vaccines are planned for Thailand, Uganda, Rwanda and Brazil — nations with some of the highest AIDS rates. The tests — which will involve several thousand volunteers — mark a de-

About a dozen potential vaccines to slow or halt the onset of AIDS are being tested on smaller groups in the United States and Europe, and several more may be available. The larger trials are likely to be ready "within a couple of years," Merson said.

But he advised against having too much hope for the vaccines.

"The major point is that we're not going to have a vaccine today and we're not going to have a vaccine tomorrow," Merson said. "We have to do everything we can to inform the public now of the risks and the need for safer sex."

It usually takes about 10 years before a person with HIV to show the full signs of acquired immune deficiency syndrome, which attacks the immune system and leads to death.

Merson said an estimated 8-10 million adults carry the human immunodeficiency virus that leads to AIDS. The agency has predicted 40

Roberts maps holiday's history

Committee actions need to stay public, representative says

MEREDITH JONES
Staff Writer

Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., spoke about politics and the evolution of Veterans Day to the College Republicans and other students in the K-State Union Forum Hall Monday night.

Roberts represents the 1st Congressional District, which is comprised of 58 counties in western Kansas and is one of the largest districts in the United States.

He said when he speaks to groups outside of his district and the state, many people get him confused with televangelist Pat Robertson.

"I'm not a member of the 700 Club," he said.

Roberts serves on the House Administration and the Agriculture committees and the joint committees on Printing and the Library.

"When you are from the 1st District (in Kansas), you're not assigned to the ag committee; you're sentenced to it ... and it's a pleasant sentence," Roberts said.

He pointed out Monday was Veterans Day and told of three Kansans who played roles in the holiday's evolution.

In 1926, World War I Armistice Day was declared a holiday, he said.

In 1954, Congressman Edward Reece of southeast Kansas introduced the original bill to change the name to Veterans Day.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower, a native of Abilene, signed the bill.

The day was eventually changed to the fourth Monday in October. Many veterans didn't like this, so Congressman Keith Sebelius, Roberts' predecessor, sponsored legislation to change the day back to Nov. 11.

Another topic Roberts spoke about was the recession.

"If you increase spending in one area, you have to find someplace else to get it," he said. "You all owe now about $18,000 on the national debt."

He said members of Congress needed to quit playing "Robin Hood" with other people's money.

He said there are 158 committees and subcommittees on the House side alone, and they all have hearings.

"When we try to do things behind closed doors, that's when we get in trouble," he said. "It is important to pass legislation, but it is equally important to keep bad legislation from passing."

Roberts is co-chairman of a subcommittee that recently took action in assuring that members of congress pay their restaurant bills.

Another problem he addressed was the legislation introduced to build a three-story, underground visitor's center at a cost of $71 million.

He said he doesn't think this is a good idea when the country is in the middle of a budget crisis.

"The way things are run is decided by the Democratic Caucus," he said.

He told a story from his days as a congressional intern when he guided an elderly man on a tour of the Capitol. At the end, the man looked up at the Capitol and said, with a tear in his eye, "I never thought I'd see the day to see my Capitol."

"It is, in fact, your Capitol," Roberts said. "Always think of (it) as your Capitol."

When asked about term limitation, Roberts, who is serving his sixth, said: "We have a term limitation — every two years."

"If you don't like the individuals, get after them. Get them out," he said.

If there were term limitations, Roberts said, he wouldn't be ranking Republican in three subcommittees, ■ See SPEECH Page 10

Candidates debate, end up agreeing

McClaskey, Wingert comment on past Senate activities

CHRISTINE VENDEL

The student body presidential debate Monday night in Derby Food Center turned out to be a misnomer as candidates Jackie McClaskey and Fred Wingert agreed on nearly every issue.

They both agreed that they do not disagree.

"Jackie and I were criticized today for never disagreeing," Wingert said. The candidates fielded eight questions posed by a mediator in front of a small group of 15. Each candidate was allotted two minutes in which to answer.

Before the quasi-debate began, Wingert explained why he does not include his current title of Alumni Affairs Director as part of his campaign.

"The main reason I don't claim it is the obvious unpopularity of the current student body president," he said. "I did a lot of things on my own initiative because of philosophical differences. I don't think Todd Heitschmidt was supportive of me or what I wanted to do."

"I wanted to make sure the students understood. Being on his cabinet might be a reflection that I agreed with his philosophy when I didn't," he said.

KSU Foundation receives KCT money

The KSU Foundation has received more than $160,000 from the former Kansas College of Technology Endowment Association, completing the legislated academic merger of K-State and KCT in Salina.

The transfer of funds was in the form of securities and cash, and it followed this summer's merger. The transfer was completed after the final audit of the KCT Endowment Association.

The transfer created 22 endowed and expendable funds within the KSU Foundation to benefit students on the Salina campus.

"Merger of the sister organizations has progressed smoothly," said Les Longberg, the Foundation's chief financial officer.

The Foundation is K-State's fund-raising arm and manages assets worth about $100 million.

4 new classes offered in WSP

Four new classes will be offered by the Women's Studies Program, three of them next semester and one during intersession.

The new courses are Contemporary Feminist Frameworks, African-American Women, French Literature in Translation and Women and Peace.

African-American Women teaches the historical roots and present-day experiences of African-American women.

Women's Studies Director Sandra Coyner said French Literature in Translation will include reading literature written by women in Africa.

"The literature was written in French but translated to English. The class should be a terrific opportunity for K-State students to get involved in something really different," Coyner said.

Contemporary Feminist Frameworks will deal with ideas of the feminist movement and how they relate to topics in the real world.

Women and Peace, taught during intersession, will review women's involvement in the peace movement.

"The underlying purpose of the classes is to help people make better decisions and be more successful because they understand how gender shapes the world around them," Coyner said.

Anne Butler, director of the educational supportive services program, will teach African-American Women. She said the classes will include a large body of knowledge not covered in existing courses.

"Most American scholarship has been exclusive and hasn't included voices of many who have made contributions of one kind or another," Butler said.

Allied bombs caused at least 17 oil fires

KUWAIT CITY (AP) — At least 17 of the hundreds of damaged oil wells in Kuwait were destroyed by allied bombs during the Persian Gulf War, a Kuwaiti official was quoted Sunday as saying.

In total, 732 wells were set ablaze or damaged in the final days of the war, and until now officials had said the damage was done by solely by retreating Iraqi occupation forces.

Issa Bouyabib, the head of the Kuwaiti team that helped douse some of the oilfires, however, said, "so far, we have been able to count 17 wells that have been hit by aerial bombardment."

"But most of the remaining wells were set ablaze by the Iraqis," he told the Al-Qabas daily.

On Thursday, the last two gushing wells in the north of Kuwait were capped, according to oil officials, ending a four-month firefighting effort.

American found dead in Italian airport

MILAN, Italy (AP) — An U.S. airport employee was in a coma Sunday after workers found him shot in the luggage compartment of a plane arriving from Los Angeles, authorities said.

Roman Soriano Vasquez, 28, was found with a single bullet wound in the head, security officials at Milan's Malpensa Airport said.

A .38-caliber pistol was found next to him, and the security officials said he probably attempted suicide.

The man was found aboard Alitalia Flight AZ 621 after it arrived at Malpensa from Los Angeles on Saturday.

Soriano Vasquez worked at the Los Angeles airport for Air Services, the officials said. He was initially identified by his company uniform and his worker's identification card.

A doctor at the Gallarate hospital near the airport said Soriano Vasquez was in critical condition.

Bone drive may find senior's match

Potential donors tested in Union; 6 tests must agree

JAYME WALL
MELANIE HUNDLEY
Collegian Reporters

Saturday, April 13, Julie Fabrizio was heading to Salina on Interstate 70.

She remembers listening to the radio. The next thing she remembers is waking up in the ditch.

Four days later, she was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia.

Fabrizius, senior in animal sciences and industry, said she had been experiencing symptoms for several months. She had noticed a lack of energy as early as the previous October and, more recently, a lack of color in her face.

Her jeans were getting tighter, yet she was losing weight.

She slept for three days after the accident.

On her mother's suggestion, Fabrizio went to Lafene for a check-up Wednesday.

Thinking she was suffering from a mild illness, such as mono or the flu, Fabrizio was shocked when the doctors told her her spleen was the size of a football. Normally, a spleen is about the size of the person's fist.

The doctors suspected she had leukemia. She went to Wichita for further testing.

Test results indicated Fabrizio's white blood count was increased to a phenomenal 500,000. A normal count is between 4,000 and 10,000.

Most people who have a count that high experience brain damage, vision loss or speech impairment, Fabrizio said.

Doctors said her wreck could have been the result of a small stroke resulting from the high white blood count.

She was officially diagnosed with leukemia Thursday, April 17.

According to the National Marrow Donor Program, Fabrizio is one of an estimated 16,000 children and adults a year who are stricken with leukemia and other blood-related diseases. For many, a marrow transplant is the only hope of survival.

Without a transplant, the survival rate is 0-5 percent.

Of the thousands who could benefit from a marrow transplant, nearly 70 percent cannot find a suitable match within their families. This is Fabrizio's dilemma.

Fabrizius' sister was tested in May as a possible donor, but her blood was

In April, K-State senior Julie Fabrizio was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia and has since tried to find a bone marrow donor through the National Marrow Donor Program. By organizing K-State's first marrow drive, she hopes to raise the number of donors in Kansas.

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Staff

not an adequate match.

So she began searching for a donor through the NMDP.

Finding a suitable donor means matching human leukocyte antigens. Antigens are areas on human chromosomes that determine if a person is compatible for a bone marrow transplant.

Fabrizius has found three donors whose marrow matches hers in five of the six antigen categories. The goal is to find a sixth matching antigen.

Transplants from unrelated donors began in 1989. Consequently, only 500,000 donors are registered in the NMDP, and only about 600 of these donors are from Kansas.

Fabrizius said she wants to increase this number. The NMDP goal for Kansas is to register 1,000 donors by the end of 1991.

"We might find a donor for me, but I really want to do it for the donor bank," she said.

The third marrow drive conducted in Kansas was Sept. 24 in Fabrizio's hometown, WaKeeney. At this drive, 118 donors were tested.

Continuing her efforts to increase the donor pool, Fabrizio has organized K-State's first bone marrow drive, which is today in the K-State Union.

Fabrizius is a member of Block and Bridle. Earlier this semester, she approached the club's advisers about sponsoring the drive. The executive board presented the idea to the general membership, and it was approved.

A committee of Block and Bridle members and representatives from other animal science clubs was formed to organize the project.

Marrow drives require a significant amount of financial support. It costs $50 to test a single donor, and drives are designed to provide potential donors the opportunity to be tested for free.

Block and Bridle has raised and donated more than $3,800 to the drive. The Horseman's Association raised another $725, bringing the total to $4,600.

The NMDP is matching this amount. The requirements to be a marrow donor are few. Unrelated donors must be between the ages of 18 and 55 and be able to pass a thorough physical examination.

Becoming a registered donor in the NMDP bank is comparable to a routine blood test. A two-tablespoon blood sample is taken from the donor and tested to determine the antigen type. These results are then entered in the NMDP computerized data bank.

When a data bank identifies a match, the individual is contacted for additional tests and to make a final decision about becoming a marrow donor.

At this point, potential donors have the legal right to withdraw. But donors are urged to think seriously before they are tested.

"It's something you should think about," said Danette King, senior in animal sciences and industry, and

Day one of many to remember wartime

Bill Arck stood in front of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on campus Monday afternoon reconciling his own war experiences.

Arck, a Vietnam veteran and contributor to the memorial, said, "When I think about the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, I realize it has important meaning for me. I think a lot about the war and how it affected so many people."

Despite the cold, rainy weather, members of the Army and Air Force ROTC placed a wreath at the memorial during a Veterans Day ceremony. Construction began in August 1989 on the memorial, which includes the names of K-Staters who served and died in Vietnam.

The idea to build a Vietnam Veterans Memorial originated in 1986 by the Air Force ROTC at K-State. Then-Gov. Mike Hayden served as the honorary chairman of a committee, which conducted fundraising projects and a competition for the memorial design. The construction took three years to accomplish instead of the expected one.

"When I look at the memorial I remember the wonderful people I met by serving on the committee," Arck said. "Wives of veterans who were so complimentary about the memorial, young people with ROTC and efforts of campus and community."

Arck said the committee is presently in the process of giving the memorial to the University. Because the memorial is complete there is no use for the committee anymore.

Capt. Jim Royer, assistant professor of aerospace studies, said the memorial ceremony provides the ROTC an opportunity to get together to recognize Veterans Day.

The ceremony included a 21-gun salute and "Taps." The American flag and the battle flag flown over the USS Coral Sea was taken down, folded and put away for the night.

Dr. Don Seidle, associate professor of laboratory medicine and a Vietnam veteran, contributed his thoughts about the war he experienced many years ago and its relation to Desert Storm.

"The thousands of lives lost were

Bush Master of the New World Order comes home

The master of the New World Order, George Bush, is coming home.

A White House spokesman made that announcement last week as the president prepared for yet another foray into the fast-paced, high-powered world of international diplomacy.

One could just barely hear over the words of the dough-faced reader of the approved text, the president's armorers preparing him for battle against the barbarians who might conceive of a non-American structure to the post-Cold War world.

Bush sallied forth and trounced the French, who suggested that maybe the Europeans might want to take care of themselves, seeing as how Stalin has been dead for 38 years now.

At the NATO summit, the president played hardball. Bluffed 'em. Gave 'em the old love-us-or-tell-us-to-leave line.

Yet, as Air Force One was winging its way back to the U.S. of A., a whine could be heard above that of the engines. It was Bush himself grousing to his sympathetic sycophants.

How dare they, (one could almost hear the president say), how dare they drag me down into the gooey mud of recession? How dare they confront me with their petty concerns about paying doctor's bills, their kids' college, the rent, the electric bill?

The sycophants pointed to the evil-omened polls and reminded the New World knight that it will soon be an election year. Power is leased, they reminded the president, from the people no matter how common an idea democracy may be.

And they explained to him a scenario, a scheme, to keep himself master of the planet. Tilt the mirror this way, they said. Blow the smoke up here, they said.

A fine idea; they'll fall for it, Bush said. He should know. After all, the naked emperor gained his seat upon the throne by producing the three-ring circus of Willie Horton, inflammable flags and Saddam Hussein.

And the winner is — none of the above

Pepsi or new Coke? Enough people refused to drink either one that they brought back Coca-Cola Classic. Soda drinkers of America knew they had power and used it. They said, "If Pepsi and new Coke are our only choices, we'll drink Shasta."

Voters of America need to do the same thing. Instead of not voting when they don't like either candidate, voters could wield their power by choosing "none of the above." A "none of the above" box should be a choice in all elections, and if the number of times this box was checked beat out either candidate, the process would begin again.

Not voting allows a candidate to win by default. By selecting "none of the above," voters force candidates to give reasons to vote for them. And if the first round of candidates couldn't do it, new candidates would be found until someone said something worth hearing.

Maybe in the case of the Louisiana governor's race, there could be an "Are you kidding? None of the above!" box. A former governor associated with gambling and corruption or an ex-Grand Wizard — what a choice.

This is just one example of the situations in which too many times voters become frustrated with the candidates and the issues and end up voting for the lesser of two evils. What is even worse is when they choose not to vote at all. This lets the no-win situation perpetuate itself.

It can't be said enough. Voting is vital, cool, powerful. Plan on voting in Wednesday's student body president runoff. And vote in the next presidential election. There won't be a "none of the above" box, but maybe someday.

In the meantime, drink a Shasta. It's cheaper, and it tastes pretty good.

Anonymously offensive

JASON HAMILTON

Comments not as bad as mentality

One of the advantages of living in a college residence hall is that I constantly get to interact one way or another with all sorts of people who are very different from myself.

Just the other day, for example, someone felt the need to articulate on my message board his or her feelings about my sex life.

"You are all fags," it said.

A lot of my neighbors appear to be pissed at me, mostly for things I haven't even done, so it is not so uncommon for me to find disparaging comments on my message board pertaining to my parentage, my mental powers and my general nature. I usually don't let it bother me.

If the anonymous author of that witty little jab had written something else, it probably wouldn't have bothered me a bit. If he or she had written, for instance, "You are all bits of poo-poo," (or something more standard and more offensive that shouldn't be printed in a wholesome college paper) I wouldn't feel compelled to write this.

I don't mind being accused of being a homosexual. I'm definitely heterosexual and even slightly homophobic. I'm fairly sure my roommate is heterosexual as well. Being accused of being something I'm not is not exactly a new experience for me.

My guess is that the author did not mean that either of us were actually homosexuals. I'm sure that he or she simply tried to come up with something that would accurately express the degree of his or her feeling about us.

It is unfortunate that what this wandering poet came up with was, "You are all fags."

There are at least two homosexuals who do live in my dorm. They don't advertise the fact they are homosexuals, and most of their neighbors are unaware of their sexual preferences. Both of them, I know, are very nice people who get along well with everyone.

I woke up at noon to find the work of this master wordsmith on my door. Fighting off a headache that lingered from the hazily remembered previous evening, I took time to think about it.

I tried to imagine how a homosexual must feel every time he or she hears the word "fag" or "homo." I tried to imagine how it must be to not be able to speak out without fear of ridicule or worse, and how it must be to try to exercise one's freedom of choice in a society that is desperately trying to keep everyone "straight."

In my imagination, it felt pretty rotten. I felt like I should apologize to everyone, even though I wasn't responsible. I erased the message and went to lunch, but it spoiled my mood all day.

Later that day, I saw a flier advertising a meeting of BaGaLs. Suzie expressed her frustration at the fact that any group of people craving respect would choose to call themselves "BaGaLs."

I tried to tell her what had happened with my message board, but it came out all wrong, and Suzie cracked another dumb "fag" joke. I realized that even people like Suzie, who choose to associate with homosexuals and even have many gay friends, can be thoughtlessly cruel.

The next day, I had regained my usual mood, which I like to think of as cheerful cynicism. I thought about it the whole day and realized that our society's persecution of homosexuals is nothing new and is just a symptom of the fact that our society is incredibly sick and twisted.

The fact that a good percentage of our population, secure in their intolerant, self-righteous and generally pathetic moral ignorance, should endeavor so hard to make a smaller percentage of the population feel like shit is par for the course in America.

So, while I don't know how to alleviate the sickness that pervades our culture, a sickness that I will undoubtedly write about in the future, I can see the symptoms and feel bad about them.

I don't think I can convince anyone not to be pissed at me. But I hope in the future they won't write "you are all fags." They might be offending a neighbor, or even a friend.

Next time, just tell me I'm full of poo-poo.

18 years of U.S. lies enough

Among the many foreign policy initiatives of the Bush administration, the recent announcement that the United States would "fast track" its efforts to normalize American relations with Vietnam must rank as one of the most troubling.

As Friday's ceremony at K-State's Vietnam Veterans Memorial made clear, there are many who think the unresolved issue of possible American POWs remaining in captivity in Southeast Asia must first be settled before relations are restored.

The last year has seen this issue generate a great deal of controversy, all of which has been dismissed by the Bush administration. Among the recent developments, however, several remain troubling reminders of our government's potential for misleading the American public in the name of "national security." A brief listing of some of the more disturbing events is given below.

July 1990 — Rear-Admiral Marryout, deputy director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, confirms that American intelligence has verified the existence in Hanoi of a warehouse in which the remains of "several hundred" Americans who died during the Vietnam conflict are stored. No action is taken by the administration to address the issue as one of the "highest national priority."

October 1990 — The Republican Minority Staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee issues an interim report charging that the United States deliberately left "several hundred" Americans behind in Southeast Asia following the conclusion of "Operation Homecoming" and then covered up the evidence. The same month, Secretary of State Baker meets with Vietnam's Foreign Minister at the United Nations to discuss restoring relations.

November 1990 — "Kiss the Boys Goodbye," a book detailing the governmental coverup of the POW issue, is published. It is denounced by the Department of Defense and reviewed by very few American publications.

May 1991 — The Republican Minority Staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee releases its Final Report, which details American policy toward retrieving American prisoners in Communist hands lost in American wars with Communist regimes since the Russian Civil War.

May 1991 — The resignation of Colonel Millard Peck, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency's office dealing with the POW/MIA issue, becomes known. In Congressional testimony, Peck charges that the government has been involved in a cover-up since 1973.

Summer 1991 — Pictures surface purporting to be Americans still held in Indochina, bringing the issue the greatest amount of publicity since the 1970s. Congress announces it will convene a special panel to re-examine the more than 1,400 "live sighting" reports compiled since the fall of Saigon.

November 1991 — The head of the American office in Hanoi, opened to facilitate the search for Americans possibly still held captive, states in Congressional testimony that Americans were left behind, "possibly 10 or less." Subsequent governmental witnesses denounce the testimony.

As the events listed above indicate, there is substantial evidence that the government has not been entirely candid on the issue of Americans imprisoned by the Vietnamese during the Vietnam War. The government has attempted to have it both ways, both denying that any Americans were left behind (or that any remain in captivity), while keeping the records and files that might resolve the issue completely unavailable. When Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, attempted to view the "live sighting" reports, he and his staff, despite their requisite security clearances, were subject to extreme restrictions on access.

The government has had 18 years to convince the American public that its version of events is both accurate and truthful. The government has failed on both counts.

POW activists think the period of greatest danger for anyone remaining in Vietnamese hands is when relations are "normalized," at which point the captives go from being an asset and bargaining chip to being a liability. Given the brutality displayed by the Vietnamese to their American captives during the war, it is ludicrous to assume they would now be "kinder and gentler" to captives if relations were restored. It is a safe assumption that they would simply kill them, as dead men truly tell no tales.

It is time for the American people to demand a final accounting from their government. As K-State's recent POW/MIA Awareness Week attempted to point out, how would you feel if one of the "10" were your father, your husband, your brother, your son or your friend? Aren't 18 years of lies enough?

LETTERS

So, who shovels Wefald's walk anyway?

Editor,

I'm not one to complain, but as I was precariously gliding toward Thompson Hall the other morning, I noticed something that irked me just a tad. Though most of the sidewalks and many of the roads on campus were at least partially covered in ice and/or snow, the sidewalk and driveway at the University president's home were completely cleared.

Now, if the president, or any member of his immediate family, braved the elements to shovel the sidewalk and driveway, I apologize right now. Otherwise, I am a little upset.

I realize the president is a very important member of the campus community and his house is a symbol of University prestige, but not many people walk on his sidewalk or cruise through his driveway.

It seems very impractical that the University would pay employees to clear such an infrequently used area while many main routes, and indeed stairwells (I know these need to be cleared after my rather painful tumble down stairs in Blumont Hall) remain blanketed in ice with a thin layer of sand being the only noticeable attempt to clear them.

Granted, it's early in the year, and these snowstorms caught many off-guard, but I think it is reasonable to assume that if the University can clear one person's yard, it can clear a few of the sidewalks thousands of students are forced to slip on on a daily basis.

Slippery sidewalks need attention

Editor,

I am writing about the poor shape of K-State's sidewalks after the Oct. 31 snowstorm. In my opinion, the sidewalks were unbearable to use for most of Thursday and had received little attention. This was understandable knowing this was the first storm of the year and worse than most we will have. But it seems odd that the sidewalks by McCain and Nichols halls were not cleared until five days after the storm.

The K-State Grounds Maintenance Crew consists of 30 people. With this many people designated to keep the campus in good shape, it is hard to understand why people do not have the privilege to walk on cleared sidewalks.

During the winter months, students are more likely to take the day off from school due to bad weather. After experiencing the poor conditions of the sidewalks after this last storm, it will only help motivate people to skip class after the next storm.

I encourage students to contact the grounds maintenance manager at 532-6446 if they think the conditions of the removal of snow from the sidewalks has not improved after the next storm. Maybe if enough people show

Bone marrow donors needed

Editor,

I would like to encourage K-State students, faculty and staff members to become potential bone marrow donors today in the K-State Union Ballroom. You can show up at your convenience, between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m.

Only a blood sample (not a bone marrow sample) is necessary at this point to register each of us with the National Marrow Donor Program. Julie Fabrizio and a host of other terrific K-Staters have done fund raising to help pay for this initial blood test, but dollar donations are welcome also.

Please relax a moment and consider your good fortune, then choose to donate your gift. Your eventual marrow donation, which your healthy body will replace in a few weeks, may allow some man, woman or child stricken with cancer or other life-threatening condition to reclaim good health and happiness.

Ambassadors try to beat dropout rates

41 percent undecided in Arts and Sciences

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

K-State will lose a large part of its current student body due to apathy, discouragement and a lack of communication.

William Feyerharm, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said nearly 25 percent of the freshman class and 8 percent of the sophomore class consistently drop out each year. Reasons include conflicts with jobs or with marriages. But, most frequently, he said, the reason is a lack of campus knowledge, apathy and discouragement.

To see that the dropout problem is minimized, ambassadors are taking action.

Though a large part of ambassadors' responsibilities is speaking to high-school seniors about K-State, they are equally involved in helping the students currently at K-State with their problems.

The ambassadors previously participated in "K-State Cares," a program where ambassadors called students new to K-State, both freshmen and transfers, and discussed problems. Problems included academics, social situations and financial situations. The students who were not reached by phone were then mailed a letter which included similar content of the phone calls. This project proved to be a success as students were receptive and appreciative to the calls and letters.

"It was really nice to get a call and know that there were people that cared and were looking out for me," said Travis Funk, freshman undecided.

"The helpful attitude that the people at K-State have is great."

Since communication with the new students was helpful in this project, the ambassadors came up with a new and additional idea for helping students: peer advising. Peer advisers are assigned to each ambassador working on the project. The advisers will get into full swing next semester.

Students who are undecided while enrolled in the College of Arts and Sciences and have lower than a 1.0 GPA will receive peer advisers.

Randy Meerian, senior in graphic design and ambassador president, said that these are the students who have the most problems and would be a good group with which to begin. He said he anticipates as the advising program grows, more students within arts and sciences will receive peer advisers.

There are nearly 1,500 students in arts and sciences who are undecided, which makes up 41 percent of the college, and more than 200 of these students enrolled late.

Feyerharm said many of these students have problems, both academic and otherwise, related to college life. They are also the ones, consequently, who are most apt to get discouraged and drop out.

There is always some sort of advising in every work situation, and there should be in the college scene as well, Feyerharm said.

"Whether you go to work for General Motors or for a law firm, somebody is going to want to know how you are doing — especially with the rookies," he said.

Local agency can help students with bad credit

Credit cards, loans can cause problems; creditors may help set up payment plan

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

One hundred and twenty-eight people from Manhattan have contacted the Housing Credit Counseling Inc. office this year because of problems with their credit.

"We had 1,600 people contact us last year," said Karen Hiller, executive director of Housing Credit Counseling Inc. "Twenty-five percent were on our debt-payment program."

Students comprise a large number of the people needing help with bad credit.

"It's a very serious problem among college students," said Tom Holder, vice president of Union National Bank. "Because of low interest rates, students feel that it's safe to take out excessive numbers of loans, but that can be dangerous."

With easily accessible credit cards and low interest rates on student loans, many students find themselves suffering credit problems. But there are ways to get help on campus.

Students experiencing any type of consumer-related problem can find help by going to the Consumer Relations Board, located in the Student Government Services office in the K-State Union.

The Consumer Relations Board can help students solve the problem or refer them to someone who can.

"We will try and help any student that is experiencing problems with their credit; having trouble balancing their budget or deciding which type of credit card is right for them," said Julia O'Dell, director of the Consumer Relations Board.

O'Dell outlined several important tips for students that are having credit problems. The first question students should ask is, "How much money do I owe?"

"We will help the students determine his income, assets and liabilities," O'Dell said. "The student will usually have two options, if their spending is greater than their income. The student can either increase their income or decrease their spending."

"From there, I will help them find creative ways of decreasing their spending or tell them they need to find a job. I want to be careful about saying you can't make long distance calls or that you're buying too much pizza and beer. I will help them make a very detailed list of what they are spending and then they have to prioritize that list."

The Consumer Relations Board mainly assists students with budgeting and other financial advice. If the problem is very serious they will probably refer the student to Housing Credit Counseling Inc. There are offices in both Topeka and Salina.

Housing Credit Counseling Inc. will help people work on a budget, or if the person is in debt, can meet with a counselor and work out a system to try and get out of debt.

Sometimes bad credit on a report can be inaccurate. If this is true, Housing Credit Counseling Inc. will educate that person on how to clean up their credit record.

"If there is a dispute with your credit rating, you should go to the credit reporting agency. Every person has a right to see their credit file. They must Center to teach community journalism

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

Seven faculty members of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications have turned an 18-month vision into a reality to help improve small-town media throughout the nation.

The Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media was approved by the Kansas Board of Regents in December 1990. Its headquarters are in Kedzie Hall.

School Director Carol Oukrop said the center is expected to formally go into operation July 1, 1992.

Center Director John Neibergall said the center has identified six major needs community media have.

These strategic tasks include teaching, doing research, putting technology to use, serving media and community, providing training and linking people and information.

Neibergall said these objectives are intended to help strengthen the community and its media.

"If we can help community media become stronger and better," he said, "they, in turn, will help their communities prosper."

Nancy Hause, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, became involved with the center while it was just an idea.

Hause, who lives in Wamego and writes for the Wamego Times, began researching how much information was available about community journalism.

When she discovered there were limited resources on the topic, she decided to get involved with the program to educate and help small town media.

"It was a project of the heart," Hause said. "All of us in the program have worked in some way with community media and realize it's so important."

Hause said the newspaper is the history of the community.

"If you kill community media, you kill the history of a community," she said.

Although the center is still in the process of getting funds, those involved have already met with various groups of people from community newspapers, radio stations, businesses and other media-related organizations.

Neibergall said the response from these groups and other schools in the country has been positive.

"We can help make a difference, and people are enthusiastic about the center," Neibergall said. "We are maintaining the traditional community by very non-traditional, high-tech approaches."

Another faculty member involved is David MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

MacFarland is one of the few faculty members involved with the electronic-media aspect of the program. He said he works with media other than print — television, radio and telephone.

"I got into it because I'm interested in the broader question of the way all of the media might work in a small town environment," MacFarland said.

"Not every small town has a radio station. Not all of them have cable systems. And they rarely have an over-the-air television station."

MacFarland said he also decided to get involved because he thought the time was right.

Basketball ticket sales moving slowly

Administrators, committee fear future allotment will be affected

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

This is the first of a two-part series on basketball season ticket sales. Wednesday: Various reactions to elimination of the annual campout.

Without an organized campout for basketball tickets this year, sales have slumped and the athletic department is worried.

TICKET SALES

In past seasons, 6,000 seats were available to students, and a large portion of those were sold through the campout. Less than 2,000 season tickets had been sold to students as of last weekend. The lack of tickets sold has puzzled the ticket sales department.

"We've made the tickets very available," said Carol Adolph, administrative assistant to the athletic department. "We're very concerned with the way sales have gone and we'd really like to know what the feeling is with the students."

Adolph said the athletic department is hesitant to attribute sluggish ticket sales specifically to the elimination of the campout. She said, however, that the effect is obvious.

"Normally, when you have a campout, we would sell most of the tickets available to students at the campout," Adolph said. "We would start selling about Oct. 15, and on that date, most of the tickets would be sold."

Adolph said sales may be slow, because students may not feel any hurry to buy tickets due to the elimination of the campout and a new general admission seating policy. She said the athletic department is counting on more tickets to be sold as the regular season approaches.

"Students may just be feeling that there's no need to rush out and buy tickets this early," said Chris Peterson, assistant director of athletics. "The exhibition game with the Ukraine team didn't draw too well. It could be people don't see those as quality games and are waiting to see what kind of team we're going to have."

Tickets will not be reserved for students indefinitely, Peterson said. On Nov. 25, all tickets set aside for students will be made available to the general public on an individual game basis for $12.

Peterson said he is concerned by low student ticket sales for more than just monetary reasons. He said if student tickets must be sold to non-students, the atmosphere of Bramlage could be affected.

"We've been known to have an enthusiastic, intimidating crowd," Peterson said. "There's no doubt it's a concern of ours that that might be hurt if we don't have the number of students that we've had in the past."

The slowness of ticket sales could be the result of a combination of factors, said Kent Calhoon, chairman of athletic ticket sales. He said excitement over the success of the football team and the uncertain prospects of the basketball team may be holding sales back.

"I think it's hard to tell just how much of an effect the last basketball season is having on sales," Calhoon said. "We were last in the Big Eight and no one's real sure how good we'll be this year. In the past, there's always been Mitch Richmond or Steve Henson for the students to relate to. This year, the most talked about player is a juco transfer no one's ever seen play before."

"I think this year is a real unfair test of the new system," Calhoon said of discontinuing the campout. "To blame it on that would be inconclusive. We use the same process for football tickets and those sales went up 25 percent."

Though the elimination of campouts may be having an effect on ticket sales, Peterson said the decision was one students supported in polls at basketball games by a 2-1 margin.

Calhoon said he thinks the ticket sales committee has developed the best possible alternative to campouts and said student input was the primary basis for decisions made by both the committee and the athletic department.

"The thing I'm most worried about is that if we don't stop showing support for the team by buying the tickets allotted to the students, we might lose some of the good seats we're getting," Calhoon said. "If the students are not showing support, they may be hurting themselves in the long run. If they aren't buying the 6,000 seats allotted to them, they might get cut back."

The colder the better for Staats

Sophomore runner attempts to salvage season of disappointment

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Has the sophomore jinx reared its ugly head yet again?

It's a question K-State cross country runner Paulette Staats hasn't really thought much about, but it's probably as good an explanation for Staats' disappointing second season as any to be offered.

For Staats, who led the Wildcat women with seventh-place finishes at both the Big Eight and Region V meets as a freshman, the 1991 campaign has been anything but what she might have hoped.

"Things have definitely not gone as well as I wanted them to," the Wichita native said. "In a couple of races, things have really been bad, to tell you the truth."

Staats said the pressure of having performed so well during her freshman season was something she looked at in a positive light entering this fall.

"It really kind of gave me more confidence this year than anything else," she said. "It didn't put any extra pressure on me, that's for sure."

One thing that has appeared to hamper Staats this season has been the heat. Her season-opening performance at the Wichita State Invitational was marred by a hot, humid day, and she blacked out near the end of her race at the Cal-Poly Invitational, the team's third meet.

She said she felt strong at the outset of both races, only to falter late.

"I remember that I felt really good about the way I got out in Wichita," she said. "And in California, at the beginning of the race, I was in pretty good shape."

"But then I blacked out. It was definitely not a good experience."

Staats' physical troubles were checked out following the blackout, and she is at 100 percent now, she said.

That was questionable at the beginning of the year, when Coach John Capriotti speculated that Staats' problems with the heat might have been amplified by another factor.

Capriotti thought his second-year star was 10 pounds overweight.

Staats disagrees.

"I don't really think my weight had that much to do with my lack of success early," she said.

That belief was apparently justified in the season's second race, when Staats performed like the freshman phenomenon who surprised so many in 1990.

At the Loyola University-Lakefront Invitational, she was third overall, hot on the heels of teammate Janet Treiber, who has been the team's top runner all season.

The weather was cool, the wind howled, and Staats seemingly was at home.

"When we went to Chicago, I had a solid race," she said. "I was much happier with what I did there."

Then came the problems in California, but a return to a colder climate — and a run in the snow at the Big Eight meet — moved Staats right back into contention for a league title.

Staats was 12th at the league meet and was the second K-State runner to cross the finish line, trailing only Treiber, who was 10th.

And now comes the Region V meet Saturday, a meet that will be contested on the same course as the earlier Wichita State Invitational.

With the change in the weather and course familiarity, Staats expects big things from the event.

"Considering the workouts we've done in the last two weeks, I'm the most ready for a race I've been all year," she said. "And once you've run on a course before, it's an advantage."

And Staats insists she won't be trying to salvage an admittedly disappointing season Saturday. She also won't be trying to make up for the loss of Janet Haskin, who has been redshirted due to injury.

"I'm just going to try to do my best," she said. "We all need to strive to score, and that's pressure in itself. With Haskin being gone, or with my not being outstanding all year, there's not any added pressure."

"I just want to be good from here on out."

Paulette Staats (left) had a disappointing fall season until the Big Eight Championships Nov. 2 in Lawrence. She placed 12th in the meet.

CU's Law expected to pick up his game

Buff point guard called on to score

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Billy Law better have a pretty strong back.

He's going to need it to carry the Colorado Buffaloes through the upcoming basketball season.

Law, a senior, showed he was capable of handling a leadership role for the Buffs last year after transferring from Butler

Billy Law

County Community College. His effort earned praise from Colorado coach Joe Harrington, who said he was one of the top point guards in the Big Eight Conference.

But that was last year, when he quarterbacked an offense that benefited from slick off-guard Steve Wise and dominant big man Shaun Vandiver. Both were 20-point scorers who helped the Buffs to their best record in more than two decades.

Law spearheaded Colorado's pressure defense and fed the shooters, running up the third highest single-season assist total in Colorado history.

Wise, Vandiver and several other key members of last year's squad are gone, and so is 71 percent of the Buffs' scoring output. Uncertain of his inexperienced squad, Harrington said he will look to Law to provide not only leadership and ballhandling, but scoring as well.

"You can always count on him to do the things a point guard has to do," Harrington said. "He handles the ball and can push it up the floor, he directs our defense in full-court pressure, and he shoots free throws very well."

"But this year, he's going to have to provide some scoring for us to compete. He didn't shoot that well last year at times, partly because he didn't have to. But this year, we'll need it."

Law was puzzled by shooting problems that plagued him last season. He connected on just 39 percent of his shots, although he was the Buffs' fourth-leading scorer with 7.7 points per contest. Law shot over 50 percent in two years at Butler County and is confident his shooting will improve this season.

"The first half of the season, I struggled from the field and allowed myself to think about it too much," Law said. "Each player goes through that at one time or another."

"But I know I'm going to be expected to score a lot more this year, and I've set my mind to that. I'm shooting the ball pretty well so far, and I know what I'm capable of."

While he won't have two proven scorers joining him in the lineup this season, Law said he will feel more comfortable with Colorado's versatility on offense this time around.

The Buffs showed glimpses of a fast-break mentality last season. But to fully take advantage of Vandiver's low-post abilities, the offense stayed in low gear. Without Vandiver, and with several athletic newcomers trying to compensate for their lack of experience, Harrington has vowed to turn the offense loose.

"Coach wants us to really get it moving this year," Law said. "It's going to be 40 minutes of pressing and running style. The other teams better be in shape, because we're going to be at their throats."

Law's role in the up-tempo game plan will be even more critical than last season. Leadership from the point position will be needed to get the most out of Harrington's cast of recruits.

Bears drop Vikings for 8th win

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — The Chicago Bears overcame their offensive problems and, for the second successive week, overcame a challenge to their NFC Central supremacy.

Neal Anderson's 6-yard run and Jim Harbaugh's 7-yard pass to Anthony Morgan capped the Bears' opening two drives — the first time all season they've scored on two consecutive marches — and Chicago took control of the division Monday night with a 34-17 victory over the Minnesota Vikings.

Anderson, who rushed for 91 yards, added a 24-yard touchdown run, and Lemuel Stinson returned an interception 34 yards for a TD as the Bears scored more than 21 points for the first time this season. Chicago had five drives of at least 10 plays and didn't have to punt until 10 minutes remained.

Chicago (8-2), which beat Detroit last week, has won four straight to take a two-game lead over the Lions. The Bears are seeking their seventh NFC Central title in the last eight seasons.

The Vikings (5-6), the only team besides the Bears to win the Central crown since 1984, fell 3 1/2 games back. Minnesota is 18-21 since winning the '89 title. The Vikings had won 23 of their previous 29 games — including three straight against Chicago — at the Metrodome.

As usual, Chicago's defense was tough, allowing 20 points or fewer for the ninth time in 10 games. Turnovers set up 10 of Minnesota's points. Chicago has won 86 of its last 88 games when holding opponents under 18 points, including all seven this season.

Kevin Butler added field goals of 50 and 41 yards for the Bears. After Minnesota went 80 yards on the game's first series, with Darrin Nelson's 6-yard touchdown run giving the Vikings their only lead, the Bears used Anderson's running and Harbaugh's short passing to take control.

Free agent total climbs to record 99; Twins' Morris files

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — World Series MVP Jack Morris and suspended Atlanta outfielder Otis Nixon were among the seven players who filed for free agency Monday to raise the total to a record 99.

Meanwhile, the Pittsburgh Pirates made a late $18.5 million, four-year offer to outfielder Bobby Bonilla, who filed for free agency on the first possible day. The offer was rejected Friday by Bonilla's agent, Dennis Gilbert, and other teams can start making offers Tuesday.

"Starting Tuesday, I will contact all the teams that have contacted us," Gilbert said. "I will start making appointments with them and see what they have to say."

Pirates general manager Larry Doughty declined to comment Monday on the offer or confirm that it had been made. Bonilla has said he was "99.9 percent" certain he would leave Pittsburgh.

The total of free agents broke the previous record of 96, set last year. Others filing Monday were three other Milwaukee right-hander Bill Wegman agreed to a $9.5 million four-year contract Monday night rather than file.

Four players were eligible to file by the midnight deadline and didn't: Los Angeles catcher Gary Carter, Houston pitcher Mike Scott and pitcher Todd Worrell and catcher Rich Gedman of St. Louis.

Morris had a 1992 option for $3.65 million but one day after pitching 10 shutout innings against Atlanta in Game 7 of the World Series, he decided not to exercise it. Twins general manager Andy MacPhail has said he hoped to re-sign Morris, who is looking to raise his salary to the $5 million-a-year range.

"I'm not optimistic at the moment," Morris' agent, Richard Moss, said Monday. "I had several conversations with Andy and the one thing we agreed on was that if anyone deserves to be at or near the top of salary structure, it's Jack Morris. What I take this all to mean is they just haven't decided whether to pay the money, that's all."

MacPhail was in Florida and could not be contacted Monday. The top-paid pitcher is Roger Clemens of Boston, who averages $5.38 million beginning next season.

Women's rugby team now 12-0

The K-State women's rugby team improved its record to 12-0 by winning the 18th Annual Ozark Rugby Tournament with shutouts of all three teams it faced.

K-State captured the title by defeating Arkansas 15-0 in the championship game.

In the final, all of K-State's points were scored on scrum-assisted tries by Tracey Bortz, Christy Allen and Becky Hamilton. Bortz added a penalty kick to complete the scoring.

In the first two games, K-State defeated Oklahoma 26-0 and Texas 18-0.

The K-State hockey team lost for the second time in two days to Missouri Sunday at George Bode Jr. Ice Arena in St. Joseph, Mo.

The Wildcats built a 2-0 lead after one period, but the Tigers roared back for five goals in the second and went on to win 7-4.

Support group helps bereaved

Professor studies how to ease grieving process

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

College students are faced with a lot of stress. Dealing with the death of a loved one on top of everything else can sometimes be too much.

Research at K-State may help grieving students. Surveys of the student body indicate that a high proportion of students have lost a friend or a family member in the past 12 months.

David Balk, associate professor of human development and family studies, has been working with and studying bereaved K-State students since August 1990. His research, "Social Support for Bereaved College Students," examines how social support and intervention can affect the students.

Balk said he is interested in learning how the grieving process can be eased.

"When someone is ripped away from us, and we will never see them again, we're not prepared for that," he said. "Bereavement is such a major, critical life event."

The research involves several elements, such as how grieving college students cope with the death, and how their attitude toward the death may change over time.

"I have serious doubt that time heals all wounds," Balk said.

He said he believes the individual may no longer be bothered by thinking or talking about the death, but that it never really goes away.

"Many people who have not dealt with death underestimate how long grief may last, as well as the intensity of grief," he said.

Students who are interested in volunteering for the bereavement project earn college credit, but it is a demanding time commitment, he said. They must fill out nine evaluations and informational forms several times that describe their personalities and give an idea of how they are coping with the death.

The students may also participate in social support groups run by two graduate assistants, which meet twice weekly for four weeks.

The group averages about five students and uses methods that attempt to provide a framework for coping, Balk said. Students can openly discuss and share their methods of coping and feelings with the other members of the group.

"Initial data does indicate that the social support groups are helping," he said.

Kirsten Tyson-Rawson, graduate student in marriage and family therapy and program research assistant, is one of the social support group leaders. She said she thinks the group helps because it allows the students to express their feelings.

"The support group is a place for people to share their experiences with loss and develop a sense of being supported," she said.

Many students have even asked if it would be possible to keep meeting once the bereavement project is complete, Balk said.

When Michelle Peterson made the transition from high school to college in 1988, she was 17 and alone, except for her 3-week-old daughter, Alicia. Michelle is now a junior in elementary education and married, trying to balance 19 hours of classwork with her family life.

Single mothers still meet goals

Life won't collapse when young, pregnant, student says

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Her big blue eyes peeked around the corner, and suddenly she came running out from behind the wall.

In frilly little socks and patterned denim jeans, she entered the living room. Blonde hair tumbled around her face as she quietly chatted and drank her lemonade. In a single leap, she pounced on her mommy's lap and rewarded her with a big kiss.

Alicia Peterson is 3 years old. Her mom is 21.

Michelle Peterson, junior in special education, has been a student at K-State since 1988. She arrived as a 17-year-old freshman with a 3-week-old baby and the goal of graduating from college.

Peterson became pregnant in her junior year of high school. But before she knew that, she had planned on graduating early and already been accepted at K-State.

After talking to her parents and getting the support she needed, she decided not to change her plans.

For Peterson, there was no choice but to keep her child. But, at the time, marriage wasn't the best thing for her, so she journeyed to Manhattan alone. She and Alicia were a team.

Many women at K-State have become pregnant at a young age or while in college. Many of these are unwanted pregnancies.

Unwanted pregnancies have become an important health issue in the last two decades. Though sex education and awareness are on the rise, statistics show that pregnancy rates on most college campuses range anywhere from 6 to 10 percent.

About 20 percent of the pregnancy tests administered at Lafene Health Center in 1990 came back positive. Out of 503 tests administered to students or their spouses, 406 were negative and 97 were positive.

Catherine Barry, registered nurse at Lafene, said home pregnancy tests make it difficult for the Women's Clinic to keep track of the actual number of pregnancies on campus. But those who visit Lafene receive special care, she said.

"Women who do come to Lafene have an advantage," she said. "We offer counseling and contraceptive evaluations, and we often refer our patients to other physicians whom our clinic has reviewed to assure the care they need."

She said counseling services are available for patients who share emotional concerns or have problems coping.

Though many college pregnancies are unintended and, in many cases, unwanted, Peterson said her story is proof that life can be normal, and being pregnant in college isn't always a bad thing.

When Peterson found out she was pregnant, she said, she knew she would have to pay for what happened — it wasn't the child's fault. But the decision to keep a child is up to each individual, she said.

"If there's no support for you, it's an even tougher situation, but luckily I did," Peterson said. "When there is no 'him,' there is definitely something to think about, because resenting a child isn't the proper way to raise one, either."

Isolation was the worst feeling she said she had. It's important for college moms to stay active and carry on as normally as possible with life as a college student, she said.

"Life doesn't have to collapse because you're young and have a child," she said.

Peterson plans to graduate in December 1992. One of her biggest joys is taking child psychology and growth development courses at K-State. She said she likes to apply the things she is learning to Alicia.

Tutoring may help beat jock stereotype

Program helps athletes with writing skills, critical thinking

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

The Academic Assistance Center is working to end the "dumb jock" stereotype.

The Athletic Support Program has been in effect since 1988 and provides support to meet the needs of incoming student athletes.

"This program is the University's effort to allow athletes to participate in the same services offered to all K-State students in a more concentrated way," said Judith Lynch, associate director of the Academic Assistance Center.

Most freshmen athletes and transfer students participate in the program, she said. Transcripts of the students are read and analyzed, then the athletic department and the Academic Assistance Center work together to determine athletes who need special attention or who would benefit from tutoring.

"The Athletic Support Program enhances the academic success of our athletes," Veryl Switzer, head of the program said.

William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and adviser for the program, said the program is not spoon-feeding the athletes but merely helping to structure their schedules by offering one-on-one tutoring instead of only offering study halls.

"Study halls alone are ineffective," he said. "If we can show them how to study efficiently by working together in groups, we have accomplished something."

The directed studies program is part of the Athletic Support Program providing tutoring for introduction to sociology and college and intermediate algebra. The participating athletes are required to spend five hours a week going over their notes, clarifying questions from lectures and gaining an overall understanding of the subject material.

Anita Cortez, language arts and learning skills specialist, teaches classes primarily to freshmen. She works with the athletes on writing skills and critical thinking so they can see themselves as being at the beginning of their professional careers.

"Athletes are underestimated," Cortez said. "They have busy schedules and time restraints, and it is essential they learn how to manage time and how to study efficiently."

Robert Pearson, freshman in business, said he feels a little uneasy at the stereotype made of athletes as being dumb jocks.

"People think athletes have an advantage by having tutors, but really the hours of practice compensate for the time lost that could be used for studying," Pearson said.

He said it is hoped these kinds of programs will help alleviate the stereotype.

Economic indicators turn down

All but wheat prices decline, says Index, which projects 4-5 months in advance

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Index of Leading Economic Indicators, which forecasts turning points in the economy, is down this month.

"The index is designed to project four or five months in advance what the Kansas economy is going to be like," said Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics.

The index is composed of six components of data specific to Kansas plus a measure of the U.S. money supply, the M2.

The Kansas components include average weekly hours of non-supervisory employment in manufacturing in Kansas, wheat prices paid to Kansas farmers, cattle prices paid to Kansas farmers, an average of prices of stock for selected Kansas-based and Kansas-related companies, new housing units authorized for construction in Kansas and initial claims for unemployment insurance in Kansas.

The components are adjusted for their variance and assigned weights based on a number of economic and statistical criteria.

This month, six of the seven components were down. The only component that went up was wheat prices.

Last month the index was slightly up from the previous month's decrease.

"The index must be consistent for three continuous months to really show a recession of expansion," Emerson said. "However, if the index was down again next month, that would be three out of the last four months, then there might be a cause for concern."

"The Governor's budget division is watching the Kansas economy very closely," the governor's press secretary Martha Walker said. "We haven't seen any substantial indicators that should cause any panic, but we are concerned."

The idea for putting together the index came about during the recession in 1982-83. Information since 1970 has been used to put together consistent data. The index is modeled after the U.S. Index of Leading Economic Indicators.

"The Kansas Index of Leading Economic Indicators is different from the U.S. index," Emerson said. "Kansas has its own economic components. This is necessary because we have less industry than some states."

Foreign language programs broadcast live to rural schools

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

Radio-television students are getting a chance to experience the real world here on campus.

About 30 students work as production assistants for the Educational Communications Center in the recently dedicated Bob Dole Hall.

Susan Kemme, senior in radio-television, helps produce Spanish-language programs that are presented via satellite to rural high schools across the United States. She runs the camera and sets up graphics for the set, which is designed to look like a Spanish garden.

Spanish I and Spanish II are interaction classes in which the video professor is taped at Dole Hall and televised in the classrooms of small high schools otherwise unable to provide a foreign-language teacher.

Kemme said having worked at the ECC will be an asset when looking for a job because of the hands-on experience.

"You can learn the basics in a class, but this is live television," Kemme said. "If something goes wrong, you must fix it immediately."

Patrick Lewis, senior in radio-television, works as an assistant for the Management Labor Relations class, taught by Stan Elsea, associate professor of management.

Lewis said getting to use the center's equipment is an important part of the production assistants' experience.

"The equipment is really state-of-the-art," Lewis said. "I have had an internship at one of the largest stations in Wichita where the equipment isn't as good."

Dave Deitch, ECC assistant director of operations, said next year he hopes to have a more structured training program for the assistants. He said the center wants to provide workshops to better prepare students to work there.

ECC was set up to provide Kansas and the rest of the country with increased educational opportunities through audio-visual media. The center offers programs in continuing education, professional development and high school and college correspondence courses.

Yugoslav army targets major cities

Tourist hotels, yachts set afire; black smoke blankets ports

By the Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia—Yugoslav federal forces attacked Dubrovnik by land and sea Monday, setting fire to tourist hotels and yachts in the harbor, and casting huge clouds of black smoke over the Adriatic port.

European Community officials reported the army was targeting the medieval heart of the Croatian city and said they would pull EC monitors out for safety reasons.

In eastern Croatia, Serbian-led federal soldiers appeared close to capturing the Danube River city of Vukovar, where an estimated 12,000 people have been living underground for three months to shelter from bombardments.

The advances were bringing the army close to capturing two cities with great symbolic and strategic importance to both sides in the 4 1/2-month-old civil war, in which more than 1,700 people have died.

Croatian President Franjo Tudjman said Dubrovnik and Vukovar had been "plunged into total war" and called for U.N. peacekeeping troops.

Earlier, Croatian officials said peacekeepers should be used only on the republic's borders, not to separate fighters within the republic.

Former U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, the U.N. special emissary to Yugoslavia, told reporters in New York that he had observed "very bad" fighting in Yugoslavia during a visit last week.

He said there were now 420,000 displaced people within Yugoslavia, in addition to hundreds of thousands in exile.

"This kind of human suffering is something that is really agonizing," Vance said.

The 14 EC monitors are to quit Dubrovnik on Tuesday as soon as safe passage is guaranteed, after enduring four days of relentless bombing and shelling.

"The whole of Dubrovnik is ablaze and surrounded by smoke," Croatian radio reported.

Shells hit two hotels in the Babin Kuk complex Monday, within 100 feet of the Hotel Argentina, which Croatia says the neighboring, socialist republic of Serbia is using the minority issue to increase its territory.

Dubrovnik lay squeezed between federal gunboats in its harbor and artillery on the hills above the port.

EC spokeswoman Renilde Steeghs quoted monitors in Dubrovnik as saying the army was directing tank fire at the walled center of the port, a medieval fortress that has been a tourist mecca for decades.

"We have instructed them to leave as soon as possible," she said from Zagreb, the Croatian one-sided."

AIDS

million adults and children will be have HIV by 2000, and a growing percentage may be children or people infected through heterosexual sex.

WHO said heterosexual intercourse was "overwhelmingly" responsible for the spread of HIV in sub-Saharan Africa, where an estimated 6 million people carry the HIV virus and 900,000 babies have been infected by their mothers.

In Asia and Latin America, the virus is also spread mainly through heterosexual practices, said the agency, reporting a 40-fold increase in reported AIDS cases in Central America since 1988.

Several theories have been put forth for why the disease has spread primarily among heterosexuals in some areas of the world, but less so in Europe and the United States.

The first outbreaks of the disease in the West were among gay men and intravenous drug users, and it is believed fewer women in these countries were exposed in the period before widespread awareness of the disease.

This in turn would lead to slower spread through heterosexual relations. Low circumcision rates and high rates of venereal disease — both of which can facilitate HIV's spread — have also been presented as possible explanations for the quick spread among heterosexuals in Africa.

About 100,000 HIV infections have been reported in the United States since 1985 because of heterosexual sex. From this figure, there were 3,100 AIDS cases that were reported last year, compared with 250 such cases reported in 1985.

In Western Europe, 1,309 AIDS cases through heterosexual sex were marrow drive co-coordinator from Block and Bridle.

"If you're not willing to give your bone marrow to someone to save their life, we don't want you to come through the drive."

Once the donor agrees to the transplant, the marrow is removed from the donor during a hospital procedure performed under general or spinal anesthesia.

Using a needle or syringe, about 3-5 percent of the donor's marrow is extracted from the hip bones.

The procedure lasts about 45 minutes, and an overnight hospital stay is usually advised. According to an NMDP brochure, donors typically experience discomfort and tenderness for a day or two.

Within two to three weeks, the donor's body naturally replaces the donated marrow.

All costs associated with the transplant are charged to the recipient.

Transplant recipients have a 50-percent chance of surviving the procedure. If it is successful, then there is a 90-percent chance that the patient will be cured.

Donating bone marrow is different from other organ transplants, Fabrizio said.

"This and a kidney are the only things people can give and live to see received," she said.

Fabrizius said she is currently positive about her chances of survival.

"She is a very strong person," King said. "She always has a smile on her face."

Fabrizius is currently taking an experimental drug daily. She said it makes her tired and decreases her appetite.

Other than that, she said she is trying to lead a normal life, graduate in August and go on to graduate school.

Right now, Fabrizio is just waiting — for a cure, for a more suitable donor or for remission.

"If I can wait a year or two, my chances get better to survive," Fabrizio said.

Doctors said they are satisfied with her current condition and white blood count. If the disease were to suddenly turn acute, however, she would need the transplant immediately.

If this were to happen, Fabrizio said she would go with the transplant using the donor who matches five out of her six antigens.

For now, she is playing a waiting game, one she compares to Russian Roulette.

But she said it's a game she believes she will win.

"I don't think I'm gonna die. But I'm going to have some really hard years ahead," she said.

"You find a lot of strength you didn't know you had."

allow you to see it without charge," Hiller said.

If the person's bad credit is accurate, then Housing Credit Counseling Inc. will educate the person on how to take care of their current debt.

"Bad credit cannot be erased," Hiller said.

If the credit problem is bad enough the person will probably want to enroll in Housing Credit Counseling Inc.'s debt-payment plan. The office will help you determine what you can afford to pay and set up a payment plan with your creditor.

Hiller and O'Dell said they agreed that one of the most important things to do is communicate with your creditor.

"It sounds silly, but you will find that if you are honest with them, they will work with you," Hiller said. "If they have to go to a collection agency, they will lose up to 60 percent of the money you owe them. They want to work out a payment plan with you."

issue, Wingert addressed his resignation from his position as chief of staff for former Student Body President Todd Johnson in the 1989-90 term.

"It was a tough decision based on my commitment to my family. I did serve for nine months and only missed out on two months," he said. "During that time we made tremendous progress."

Wingert's family commitment was to his father, who was running for Congress. Wingert sat out a semester to help his father campaign.

McClaskey also answered some questions before the debate.

She was chairperson of the Holton Hall Council, which oversees the account from which $23,000 was intended to be taken to buy Student Governing Association office furniture. The furniture was ordered during the summer without going through the proper channels, and McClaskey said she did not take any action because she no longer had any control over the account.

"It was put back into control of the regular Foundation account," she said.

McClaskey said she did not even know the Holton money was earmarked for payment of the furniture until a few days before it was disclosed during a Senate meeting.

"I got here this summer in late July, and I had no idea," she said. "If I would have, I would have been adamant that we use the proper channels."

On another issue, some senators have said the administration exerts too much pressure on student government. McClaskey said she would not let anyone push her around as president.

"We don't need to not cooperate on everything or have the attitude that everything they say goes," she said. "We need to have mutual respect."

McClaskey said during the debate that some people who were elected to Senate chose not to show trust or respect for the administration.

"Instead, they take a defensive role, almost prepared for the administration to try to stab students in the back, and I don't think that is appropriate, either," she said.

The two candidates also showed general agreement on a number of issues during a noontime debate Monday in the K-State Union.

The two did disagree on one point: how to promote diversity within the executive branch of student government.

McClaskey said the way to do this is to change the structure of the presidential cabinet by contacting all campus groups to find students who are willing to contribute to student government.

Wingert said he tried to include diversity in the core group of people he recruited to work on his campaign.

Wingert relieved of duties by Heitschmidt

Dismissal as alumni affairs director related to candidate's comments

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Fred Wingert, student body president candidate, was relieved of his duties as alumni affairs director Tuesday morning by Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt.

Heitschmidt said the dismissal was related to comments attributed to Wingert in Tuesday's issue of the Collegian.

The comments came from an interview prior to the student body president candidate debate at Derby Food Center Monday night. He was asked to explain why he does not include his current title of alumni affairs director as part of his campaign.

"The main reason I don't claim it is the obvious unpopularity of the current student body president. I did a lot of things on my own initiative because of philosophical differences. I don't think Todd Heitschmidt was supportive of me or what I wanted to do."

"I wanted to make sure the students understood. Being on his cabinet might be a reflection that I agreed with his philosophy when I didn't," Wingert said Monday night.

After seeing Tuesday's Collegian, Heitschmidt said he talked to Wingert and made the decision to release him.

"Whether you're in the public arena or not, you don't make those statements in public. You discuss them with whomever you work for, not take it out in public," he said.

Heitschmidt's Chief of Staff Darin Batchman said Heitschmidt told him Tuesday morning that he was upset with Wingert's comments.

"Todd felt Fred didn't approach him first and made statements to other people instead of Todd," Batchman said.

Batchman said he thought Wingert was very concerned about the furniture fiasco earlier this semester, but if he felt uncomfortable working with Heitschmidt, he should have resigned.

"He should have said 'I don't care to work with you' instead of hanging on," Batchman said. "Instead of telling us how he was feeling, he took shots at Todd in the paper. I'm sure that's why Todd acted the way he did."

Wingert, however, said the termination of his position was a mutual decision between himself and Heitschmidt.

"He felt, and I agreed, that because of the campaign, it would be best I no longer serve on cabinet," he said. "It would make the transition for the new student body president easier."

Heitschmidt said that is not true. "It has nothing to do with transition. It has to do with the people who serve on my cabinet and my expectations of them," Heitschmidt said.

Wingert admitted there may have been other reasons for the release, but it was a private matter.

"Other things are between Todd and I," Wingert said.

Batchman said Wingert's release would not have any long-term effects on the cabinet or student government.

"Obviously, the point that he's not on cabinet anymore is pretty moot since Todd only has about a week left as president, but Todd was frustrated Fred had chosen to handle it the way he did."

Heitschmidt said this is not the first time it had been discussed to release Wingert from cabinet.

"We had a meeting Oct. 3 about dismissing him. At that meeting we came to a reconciliation about issues, about his role in my cabinet, etc.," Heitschmidt said.

Heitschmidt said he did not understand why Wingert made comments to the Collegian reporter referring to a lack of support on Heitschmidt's behalf.

"Alumni affairs director was not a position before this year. He approached me about it, and I said if you're interested, go for it. To put the blame on me for not supporting him,"

Marrow drive successful

Donors exceed expectations as more than 900 volunteer to help K-State student

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Response to the bone-marrow drive for a K-State student Tuesday was so great that supplies were exhausted before half of the 900 volunteer donors were tested.

Prepared to test only 300 people, the drive coordinators said they were pleasantly surprised by the large turnout.

Before supplies ran out, 473 potential donors were tested.

A waiting list was then started for those who wanted to give but arrived too late. More than 400 people signed the list.

The drive, sponsored by Block and Bridle, was the largest National Marrow Donor Program drive to date in Kansas and the first drive on a Kansas college campus.

The response was great from the Manhattan community as well as surrounding areas, organizers said.

Faculty, students and community members volunteering to be tested began filing in at 8:45 a.m.

Lafene Health Center received calls from people in surrounding communities asking where and how to donate.

"I'm just really excited that K-State showed its support," said Julie Fabrizius, senior in animal sciences and one of the drive's coordinators.

Fabrizius, who suffers from chronic myelogenous leukemia, is searching for a marrow donor through the NMDP.

Like many other children and adults stricken with leukemia, she has only about a 5-percent or less chance of survival without a marrow transplant.

Fabrizius instigated the K-State marrow drive in hopes of increasing the number of Kansans registered in the donor bank.

After Tuesday, the number of people registered in the bank increased from 1,047 to more than 1,500.

According to the NMDP, there is about a one-in-20,000 chance of finding a matching, unrelated donor

Veterans' blood donations refused

Some contracted Gulf parasite that is potentially fatal

By the Associated Press

BALTIMORE — The Pentagon will temporarily stop accepting blood donations from Persian Gulf war veterans because a few of them brought home a parasite that causes a potentially fatal disease, a published report said.

AIDS

The group that oversees blood banking in the United States agreed during an emergency meeting here Monday to extend the blood donation ban to any civilian who visited any of the eight Persian Gulf countries since Aug. 1, 1990.

The (Baltimore) Sun reported in its Tuesday editions that 19 veterans of the war carry a parasite that causes the disease leishmaniasis.

The parasite is often spread by the bite of sand flies. The disease usually causes skin lesions, but one strain causes diarrhea, fever, chills, weight loss and anemia and can be life threatening, said Lt. Col. Jean Freitas, a spokeswoman for the Department of Defense.

Seven of the 19 American cases were of this severe strain.

Although "the risk of contamination by blood transfusions is very slight," Freitas said that Dr. Enrique Mendez, assistant defense secretary for health affairs, will order the ban Tuesday and keep it in effect until a screening procedure is developed to detect the parasite.

The Pentagon contacted the American Association of Blood Banks as some 7,000 of its members began their 44th annual meeting in Baltimore on Friday.

Donald Doddridge, the association's president, said Monday that the blood

'Chop' offensive to some

Stereotypes, both positive and negative, surround sports fad

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian Reporter

The crowd cheers and boos, becoming a sea of arms extending and contracting as the home team threatens to score against its opponent.

Baseball and football fans alike at high-school, college, and professional sporting events are taking part in this rapidly growing fad — the tomahawk chop.

Although many people see no harm in doing the tomahawk chop, there are some who feel it stereotypes Native Americans in a negative light.

As with Native Americans across the country, those at K-State are mostly in agreement about the issue. Though the tomahawk chop is all in fun, students said, it is symbolic of the overall treatment the Native Americans have endured.

One northeast Kansas Native American spoke on the condition of anonymity about the situation surrounding the tomahawk chop in the Kansas City area.

He said the tomahawk chop reflects a stereotypical image of the Native Americans.

"Indians are proud people who were brave in war," he said. "The reason there aren't many Native Americans protesting it is because their real ways are the family ways."

Darren Geimausaddle, president of Native American Student Body, was unfamiliar with the tomahawk chop but voiced his concerns upon learning what it was.

"I can see the chop for what it is," he said, "but it is symbolic of a greater disrespect for our people that has been going on for many years."

"Our culture has been trivialized like it means nothing and without regard to the Native Americans' feelings," Geimausaddle said.

The assistant adviser to the NASB, Dorothy Roberts, said the chop was silly and crass.

"If people want to demonstrate ignorance and lack of knowledge, then they have that right," she said.

Geimausaddle told of an instance where a 5-year-old boy asked him if he still killed people.

"We aren't savages as Hollywood portrays us. We have love, respect, and reverence for all of nature, and that includes mankind."

"I don't know why it is just us," Geimausaddle said. "There aren't any teams called the Atlanta Mexicans, the Cleveland Honkies or the Manhattan Jews."

The tomahawk chop became popular this year by such teams as the Atlanta Braves, the Kansas City Chiefs, the Cleveland Indians and many high-school and college teams.

Florida State University, which is the home of the Seminoles, has done the tomahawk chop for many years. It has more recently been adopted by many other teams in the sports world.

Flint Hills national park unlikely

Kassebaum pushes for a privately funded ranch, not monument

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., on Tuesday ended nearly all chances that Congress will soon enact legislation creating a national park system prairie preserve in the Flint Hills of Kansas.

Kassebaum announced that she would not sponsor House-passed legislation in this Congress to create the Flint Hills Prairie National Monument, which would be part of the national park system.

The senator will also oppose any efforts to force the measure to the Senate floor in the 102nd Congress, which runs through this year and 1992, according to Mike Horak, a spokesman for Kassebaum.

However, Kassebaum expressed support for a different proposal — establishment of a private foundation to buy a ranch in the Flint Hills and allow public access to the land.

The House passed legislation last month to permit the government to buy the 11,000-acre Z-Bar Ranch near Strong City in Chase County. The plan calls for the National Park Service to operate as a tallgrass prairie park and a model historic cattle ranches.

"I believe this property should be preserved and the public should have access to it. However, I believe we must first explore protecting it through a private initiative not federal," Kassebaum said in a written statement.

Until Tuesday, neither Kassebaum nor Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., had publicly declared a position on the House legislation.

Supporters have viewed Kassebaum as a key figure in the congressional debate and potentially more likely than Dole to support the House proposal.

Agricultural groups in Kansas, including the Farm Bureau, have vigorously opposed the House legislation and Dole has been a long-time ally of farm interests.

Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Wichita and chief sponsor of the prairie park bill, said he was "very disappointed" that Kassebaum would not back the legislation, which has divided the state's delegation in the House.

Glickman and Reps. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park, and Jim Slattery, D-Topeka, are sponsoring the plan. Opposing it are Reps. Pat Roberts, R-Dodge City, and Dick Nichols, R-McPherson whose district includes the ranch.

Glickman held out hopes for a future compromise, saying he would work with Kassebaum and others.

Kassebaum suggested that money could be raised to buy the property if the state issued commemorative license plates. She pointed out that Maryland issues special license plates to help provide money for conservation efforts involving the Chesapeake Bay.

The National Park Service has estimated that it could cost about $4 million to buy the land and another $2 million to $4 million to develop the property for a historic monument.

Glickman questioned whether a private foundation could raise the needed money. He said the project would be less significant if it's not part of the national park system.

"One of the goals of creating the Brazilian airliner plunges into city

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil (AP) — A Brazilian domestic airliner plunged in flames into a public square in the city of Recife on Monday, killing at least 17 people, including two on the ground, O Globo TV reported.

The TV network said the Nordeste airline plane had just taken off from the northeastern Brazil city bound for the tourist island of Fernando de Noronha, off Brazil's Atlantic Coast.

The twin-engine, Brazilian-made Bandeirantes plane was on fire when it began its dive into the southern sector of Recife, which has more than 1.2 million residents, the report said.

Globo showed film of rescuers at the site and ambulances carrying off victims.

Rebel camp destroyed in Sri Lanka

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (AP) — At least 15 guerrillas were killed when government troops destroyed a Tamil rebel base in the jungles of northern Sri Lanka, military officials said Tuesday.

Officials at the Joint Operations

Command in Colombo said troops recovered a cache of weapons and the bodies of 15 rebels, but they believe casualties are higher. One soldier was injured in the operation, which began Monday, said the officials, who cannot be identified under briefing rules.

More than 8,000 people have been killed since June 1990, when Tamil Tiger rebels resumed their campaign to carve out an independent Tamil homeland in northeast Sri Lanka.

Tamils make up 18 percent of the population of 17 million. They say the Sinhalese majority, which controls the government and military, discriminates against them.

Leadership for "U" in '92

Dear Fellow K-Stater:

As a candidate for Student Body President, I have spoken about the need for our next student leader to reach out to students rather than expect students to seek out him or her. Once again, Student Government needs to become a service to all students.

As a senior majoring in Agriculture Economics and International Studies, I feel I have the experience to serve you well as your next Student Body President. Some of my experience includes:

- Two terms as a College of Agriculture Student Senator
- Current Vice Chair of Student Senate (both are elected positions)
- Lobbyist for K-State on state and national levels
- Member of Leadership Development Planning Committee, Strategic Planning Committee, and Blue Key Senior Honorary
- Intern for Senator Nancy Kassebaum
- K-State Nominee for 1992 Truman Scholarship

Please take time to vote today in the Union. If you have any questions, please stop by our table on Union Plaza.

Unsanitary places may be to blame for sicknesses

Department checks for local health violations

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Tracing back what a person has eaten for the past few days may be a good idea when he or she is sick for an unknown reason.

Sicknesses caused by poor sanitation at food establishments can be reported to the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department.

To assure a high standard of sanitation, health specialists supervise, inspect and evaluate places or activities related to public health.

RCMHD Sanitarian Joe Kitterman said about 300 places in Riley County and Manhattan are inspected, including food service establishments, schools, grocery stores, hotels, taverns, Greek houses, convenience stores and stadiums.

State law or city ordinance requires these stores to be inspected twice a year or whenever a store has changed owners.

Food and drink establishments are required to have a state license, while food warehouses and grocery stores need city ordinance approval.

Kitterman said the health department in Manhattan inspects all these establishments.

Food must be stored below 45 degrees or above 140 degrees. Contamination results when bacteria multiplies on food is stored between these temperatures.

When necessary, the health department examines all nuisances, sources of filth and causes of sickness that may be injurious to the community's health.

The department gets complaints from the public about food establishments.

"The complaints usually have nothing to do with the quality of the food," Kitterman said. "The most common complaint is that there was no soap in the restroom."

Kitterman said if someone gets sick from eating at a certain restaurant, a more thorough inspection is conducted to find the cause.

Food-borne illness is when one person gets sick from eating at a particular restaurant.

Kitterman said the most common cause of food-borne illness is contamination from storage at improper temperatures.

A food-borne outbreak is when two or more people become ill from food eaten at different restaurants.

Kitterman said outbreaks are rare; food-borne illnesses are more common.

"It is hard to determine if a person got sick at a particular restaurant because there is a 72-hour incubation period," Kitterman said. "Some people get sick from a restaurant in less than a day, while others do not acquire it until three days later."

If the inspection turns up a health hazard that could make someone sick immediately, the store has 10 working days to correct the problem. Maintenance corrections are given four to six months.

Kitterman said the University recently hired a sanitarian to inspect the campus.

"The health department and I try to keep each other informed about the facilities," said Ronald Bridges, University sanitarian and public safety assistant.

Bridges said he has had no public complaints since he began his job in July.

monument is to put Kansas on the national park map — to encourage people to visit Kansas and view our natural wonders," Glickman said.

Kassebaum made her announcement a day after visiting the community of Council Grove, which is near the site of the proposed prairie preserve. She said the proposal has badly divided Chase County residents.

She said a private foundation would eliminate the concerns of opponents, who fear the government might try to expand the proposed park in the future and acquire land through condemnation. In addition, she contended a foundation would "give Kansans more say in the use and management of this property."

The land is owned by a bank in Kansas City, Mo., which is willing to sell it to the government. The legislation also prohibits the government from using its power of condemnation to acquire property for the prairie park.

in the general population.

There needs to be at least one million registered in the bank to find matches for the 16,000 children and adults stricken with blood-related diseases each year, said Tanya Brown, coordinator of the American Red Cross NMDP donor center in Wichita.

Currently, 500,000 people are registered in the computerized donor bank.

Brown attributed the drive's success to the amount of education provided to the Manhattan community through Block and Bridle's fund raisers and Fabrizius' efforts.

There are also a lot of people hoping to help Julie or others in situations similar to hers, she said.

"I think K-State is a caring group of people," Brown said.

Before the drive, $10,000 had been raised to pay for donor testing during the drive, which costs $50 per donor. The costs of Tuesday's drive totaled more than $25,000.

Block and Bridle is already planning more fund raisers to cover the deficit and pay for another drive early next semester for those who could not be tested Tuesday.

"You can't turn college students who want to donate away," said Danette King, senior in animal sciences and drive co-coordinator from Block and Bridle.

King said she is confident funds will be found to support the second drive.

Block and Bridle is looking for support from other organizations on campus.

For now, Fabrizius' parents may have to cover the costs. Fabrizius said she hoped they would be reimbursed. Brown urged people to be informed about the commitment involved in being part of the NMDP, as well as how important it is.

Four donors have been harvested through the Wichita NMDP donor bank. One of those donations was made earlier this year.

The recipient is doing very well, Brown said. Since the transplant, the recipient and donor have corresponded. Brown said she expects them to meet in 1992.

Six months to a year after a marrow transplant, the recipient and donor have the opportunity to meet, if they both agree, she said.

"In what other cases can a donor and recipient meet?" she asks. "It's a very rewarding experience."

Kidney and bone marrow are the only two types of transplants in which a person can donate and live to see the organ received.

Brown urged minorities to register with the bank because it is difficult for minority members to find compatible donors.

Only 8 percent of those registered in the NMDP bank are non-Caucasian, Brown said.

Are you at risk for diabetes? Could you already have diabetes and not know it? Take the Test. Know the Score.

Write in the points next to each statement that is true for you.
If a statement is not true for you, put a zero.
Then add up your total score.

Scoring 3-5 points:

If you scored 3-5 points, you probably are at low risk for diabetes. But don't just forget about it. Especially if you're over 40, overweight, or of Black, Hispanic, or Native American Indian descent.

What to do about it:

Be sure you know the symptoms of diabetes. If you experience any of them, contact your doctor for further testing.

Scoring over 5 points:

If you scored over 5 points, you may be at high risk for diabetes. You even may already have diabetes.

What to do about it:

See your doctor promptly. Find out if you have diabetes. Even if you don't have diabetes, know the symptoms. If you experience any of them in the future, you should see your doctor immediately.

The American Diabetes Association urges all pregnant women to be tested for diabetes between the 24th-28th weeks of pregnancy.

This test is meant to educate and make you aware of the serious risks of diabetes. Only a medical doctor can determine if you do have diabetes.

VOTE Record-breaking turnout still shows apathy

More students voted in the general elections this year than in any campus election since 1979.

"Way to go, students," they say. "Thanks for showing all of Kansas that K-State students care about what happens to their University."

Hello.

Wake up.

Even though it appears 1991 K-Staters are breaking out of that apathetic mode, the 5,512 voters who did show account for little more than 25 percent of students enrolled at K-State.

Not even half the K-State population gives a hoot. Nice, eh?

According Student Governing Association, elections including referendums, such as the recently successful Farrell Library and Rec Complex ones, always draw a larger crowd. Students seem to think their votes actually make a little difference in these cases.

The student body presidential run-off elections, however, typically draw a way small crowd. People don't seem to think there's much worth voting for when it comes to choosing the individual who will represent their University.

The average voter turnout for run-off elections is 2,500. Whoever said Americans are apathetic?

Maybe more students think referendums directly affect them. Or maybe they think referendums affect in what way, not to mention how much of, their money is spent.

Well, as we should all recall, decisions made by student body presidents do affect all students and their money.

So, do something. Use your power.

The presidential run-off election is today.

If you're already informed, keep up the good work. If you're not, get with the program.

And if you think it's not worth the two minutes it takes to pick up a ballot, think again.

Vote.

AIDS Cuban victims locked away without the key

Cuba has made its effort to contain the 20th-century plague.

Every individual found to carry the HIV virus, sick or not, is locked away.

Practically everyone old enough to have sex is tested for the virus. This is by government decree, and there are no exceptions.

As of Oct. 1, the Cuban government held in confinement 478 men and 192 women. Today, 44 of the 670 patients have AIDS. The rest are healthy for the moment, week, year or decade.

All countries, except Cuba, allow people to make their own decisions about AIDS — whether to make love, whether to be tested, what to do after a positive diagnosis.

In Cuba, everyone who tests positive for the HIV virus is confined indefinitely in one of seven sanitariums. These patients are interviewed about past sexual partners who, in turn, are tested. If they test positive, they, too, are put away.

In a land where shortages are commonplace, these imprisoned patients enjoy luxuries not afforded other Cubans — steak, chocolate ice cream, free phone calls, medical care, antibiotics, AZT and condoms.

Despite these delicacies, patients have said they are nonetheless unhappy. Unhappy because they're not trusted. Unhappy because they have no future. And unhappy because they are condemned to whatever the government decides.

Patients legitimately call their new homes prisons, not sanitariums.

Unlike any other nation in the world, the HIV infection rate for new cases in Cuba is decreasing somewhat. But this is not justification to treat HIV-infected patients and AIDS victims like criminals.

In the United States, AIDS is a disease, and Americans are trying to deal with it.

In Cuba, AIDS is not a disease. It is a crime. And victims are imprisoned like criminals.

HUH?

Communication links weak, but all we have

ERIC BECKER

A friend recently mentioned a scene from one of Woody Allen's movies, "Annie Hall."

In the scene, Alvy Singer (Woody Allen) and Annie Hall (Diane Keaton) are speaking on the balcony of her New York City apartment during the early stages of their relationship.

On the surface, they are talking about Annie's photography and the developing aesthetic of the medium. What they are really trying to say appears, unspoken, in subtitles at the bottom of the screen, and has more to do with their curiosities and insecurities in the relationship that is developing between them.

On one level or another, virtually everything we do is an effort to communicate. Our dress, hairstyle and personal appearance are, on a practical level, one way we communicate something about ourselves to those we come into contact with.

We write prose and poetry. We compose and perform songs. We hang signs and write messages in chalk on sidewalks. We take pictures and make movies. We write papers for class to communicate our learning to our teachers. Our teachers schedule conferences with students and ultimately give grades, which are meant to communicate the success of our work in class.

But as in the scene with Alvy Singer and Annie Hall, much of what we say and do must fall short of what we mean to communicate. The subtitles hang invisibly beneath our mouths. Our communications are steeped in insecurities and subtleties. Our messages are incomplete and sometimes lost in the deepest structures of the scheme in which we live.

As a close and sentimental friend of Jana Leep, this writer was particularly touched by the challenges of communication her study in France is presenting, and which were communicated in her column in the Nov. 7 Collegian.

But although the particular challenges of her experience are set thousands of miles from Manhattan, the larger challenges of communicating affect everyone.

We are awash in a world of words, in a world where words must be ordered and structured to relate ideas.

This need for communication seems to be part of the reasoning behind education. In college, we take courses in composition and speech. Some majors must learn a foreign language as well.

These are the most obvious examples of the current educational system's efforts to address the need for communication. But every class and every curriculum necessarily deals in the concept. Architects and engineers communicate their ideas in pictures and technical notations. Mathematicians have their equations. Artists express themselves in a myriad of modes, all of them inevitably designed to reach out and communicate with others.

One might think that with so many methods of communication, it would now be easier than ever to send and receive messages.

But it seems that despite our capabilities, our mass of possibilities and our genuine ability to share information specifically and accurately, it is precisely this complexity of language that sometimes confuses us.

We are tangled up in an inescapable network of words and ideas, each affecting others so that it is difficult to tell where the truth and fiction of our words and experiences begin and end.

So we speak in our subtleties. And always will. But once in a while, we seem to connect, and these occasional links seem to be enough. It was enough for Alvy and Annie.

For a while, anyway.

Turtles, fire & brimstone

Columnist develops personal beliefs

Religion has been on my mind of late.

Of course, I've always been struggling for ultimate enlightenment when it comes to spiritual matters, but recently it's been a lot stronger.

I think it was that lecture on Satanism that tipped the balances.

It just got me thinking.

Of course there have been a few other incidents that have kept religion and the whole God thing on the tip of my brain. (Namely a few nightmarish run-ins, or rather collisions, with some born-again Christians.) But for the most part, this "spiritual delving," if you will, was triggered by the issues raised at Jon Rittenhouse's lecture.

The basic gist I got from ol' Jonny (in my annoyingly simplistic voice) is: first, Satanism is bad; second, big bad drugs are a "gateway" to Satanism; and third, Christianity is the best religion.

Now, I realize Jonny didn't actually say Christianity was the best, but unless you were comatose or otherwise dysfunctional, his message was clear.

STEFFANY CARREL

His team is the winner.

That's great.

I mean, I don't care what Joe Schmoe believes in — Jesus Christ, Milton Berle, George Bush — whatever. It's none of my affair.

But one of my friends summed up my dilemma perfectly.

She said, "We don't care what they believe in, as long as they don't bother us. The problem is that their beliefs tell them to shove their religion down our throats!"

I certainly understand that not all Christians are like this. I don't want any damn hate mail accusing me, of all people, of generalizing. And let me take this opportunity to say I don't want any of you who do fit the stereotype to send me any Bible-quoting crap saying how "sorry" you feel for me or how everyone must pray for me so I may see the light and live happily ever after.

A bit extreme, I realize, but trust me, if and when I decide I absolutely have to have a "personal relationship with Jesus Christ, our Savior," I'll go down to Wal-Mart and buy it myself.

OK, OK. Right now, I will tell you that I honestly think Christianity is a good thing. It works for the people who believe in it. It provides them answers that wouldn't otherwise be there. It gives them a hope that this planet and the life they live on it isn't "all there is." It gives them guidelines to live by and a framework to live within. It provides a sense of community and family. It's social control. It's good.

My point is that all religions provide these things. Well, not all, but most.

I think we invented religion for just those reasons. As humans, we need that kind of security, that kind of reassurance. We can't handle thinking that it's just us teeny humans in the abyss of the universe. We need religion.

I'm not sure what I believe. I'd like to think there's a God out there. It's not some bearded guy in white robes, though.

Maybe, as George Carlin puts it, it's "The Big Electron."

On that note, I'll let you in on my personal 10 Commandments.

I know, I know. I'm pretty darn bold to mess with the ol' Stone Tablets, but a little improvement never hurt anybody.

- The 10 Commandments:
1. Eat well.
 2. Sleep well.
 3. Work hard.
 4. Don't hurt anybody.
 5. Feed your brain its Wheaties.
 6. Stand up for your rights.
 7. Live your life like you're a turtle on fire.
 8. Honestly accept yourself.
 9. Make big ugly mistakes.
 10. Learn big ugly lessons from your big ugly mistakes.

Basically, just don't collide with any of your fellow turtles, and your life will be swell.

U.S. English needs common sense

Editor,

So, U.S. English thinks other languages are like secondary cigarette smoke, and we should be protected from them by law?

This isn't the first time this group, founded in 1983, has turned common sense on its head. In the group members' crusade to make it illegal for state or federal government to use any language other than English, they once claimed they were combating racism since bilingual voting acts assume that non-whites are not clever enough to learn English.

It is certainly true they have failed to support bilingual education, despite the fact that a recent poll in Florida, for example, shows that more than 98% of Spanish-speaking parents want their children to learn better English by participating in such programs.

This group, whose leadership is rich, powerful and reactionary, has from time to time enlisted personalities such as Arnold Schwarzenegger and Walter Cronkite to help convert fear of anything "foreign" into votes. Many, discovering that U.S. English is basically an anti-Spanish operation founded in prejudice, have withdrawn their support.

The Linguistic Society of America (no wild-eyed anarchistic group) has affirmed that English in America is not threatened and that our unity has never rested primarily on unity of language anyway, but rather on common political and social ideals — a theme reflected in the Collegian's editorial. The LSA also notes that it is to the economic and cultural advantage of this nation as a whole that citizens should be proficient in more than one language.

Thanks, Collegian, for bringing this issue to readers' attention, and also for the creative way in which you did so.

Dietetics more important than high-tech equipment

Prevention key to saving money in health-care field

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

Politicians and administrators who support high-tech medical equipment but do not support dietetics programs may not see the point: They pay more to cure the bad health care situation than they would pay to prevent it.

"It is estimated for every dollar of training of dietitians the community earns $3," said Doris Derelian, speaker of the House of Delegates for the American Dietetic Association.

Derelian said this calculation, which is based on health-care savings as result of nutrition intervention, includes also training and expenses of dietitians.

She spoke at a dinner for K-State's coordinated program in dietetics in the Department of Hotel, Restaurant, Institution Management and Dietetics in Derby Food Center Tuesday.

Politicians are trying all kinds of things to ease the health-care crisis, Derelian said. At the same time, they cut down on financial support for university programs that train the experts to deliver the health-care message to the people, she said.

"The University of California at Los Angeles just lost its nutrition department, completely," Derelian said.

She said UCLA's program was axed without any acknowledgment that there might be any support for it. The program was eliminated before they knew what to do.

"We should have acted faster with a greater zeal," Derelian said, who completes her Ph.D. in educational psychology at UCLA Monday.

She said from observing such cuts as the one at UCLA, the ADA has come to realize that there is a need for better educational marketing in dietetics.

"The first slot was to protect K-State's program," Derelian said.

She said K-State's dietetics program was threatened like the one at UCLA, but compared to UCLA, there was a rage of support at K-State.

Derelian said ADA cannot allow these shutdowns to happen because, in fact, there are not enough dietitians, and all statistics indicate the need for competent health-care professionals will increase in the following years.

"According to the Department of Labor, we are at this moment about 40 percent short of the dietitians we will need by the year 2000," Derelian said. "Dietetics and food-related businesses are expected to grow by 40 percent between now and the year 2000 and even higher after that."

She said somebody has to fill those positions, and ADA right now is experiencing a difficulty in getting enough people trained.

Also, she said legislators, who currently work out a health-care reform, need qualified advice.

"In Washington at this point, 36 pieces of legislation include some kind of support of health care," Derelian said.

She said dietitians can tell legislators what services have to be built into the law if they expect real prevention, real health care and real cost savings.

"We are right there," she said. "The reason we are there is because there are programs like at K-State that produce people who are competent and able to deliver the message."

Derelian also said the less adequate national health care there is, the more important local programs become.

"For the degree to which national distribution of health care services is at crisis, there needs to be a local program in Kansas so that Kansans have access to health-care services," she said.

She said an ADA membership database suggests most dietitians continue to work in, or in the vicinity of, their training site. Consequently, she said, Kansas' dietetics programs produce dietitians working in Kansas and serving the Kansas community.

"We want a national distribution of dietitians who are competently prepared," Derelian said.

Deborah Canter, associate professor of hotel, restaurant, institutional management and dietetics, said originally the dinner was meant to make the dietetics program more popular among administrators, but many administrators did not respond.

"Originally, we hoped the dinner would be a chance to market the dietetics program to some of the administrators on campus," Canter said. "Now we have to think about how we can more effectively market ourselves."

Todd Heitschmidt, student body president, said it was important for him to come, considering what happened last year with the proposed closing of the College of Human Ecology.

"Maybe there is something we can do as students to help the students," he said. "Administrators need to be here."

Helping while they learn

Students experience other cultures while aiding developing nations

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Community Service Program has sent students to Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic for the past three years. Paraguay may be added to the list this year.

"We're interested in providing students with the opportunity to learn about other cultures and about citizenship," CSP Director Carol Peak said.

The international service teams are modeled after a larger program that places groups of students in Kansas towns.

To be eligible for the program, a student must be fluent in Spanish. Peak said the ability to communicate is extremely important in low-income areas.

Students interested in the project must submit applications, part of which are written in Spanish, and resumes. Transcripts and four references must also be provided.

The program directors prefer students who have at least a 3.0 grade point average and are juniors or above. During the interview, the Department of Modern Languages helps evaluate the students' proficiency in Spanish.

The students who are selected then enroll in a preparatory seminar during the spring semester and are required to take a Spanish course.

"They live and work in a community for eight to 10 weeks during the summer," Peak said. "They spend the spring semester in preparation."

The communities to be served design the projects the students will work on, but the program raises the funds to pay for travel and living expenses.

Marnette Denell, senior in modern languages and political science, applied for the 1992 summer program. She said she wants to be part of an international team because she'd like to take what she's learned and do something with it.

"I've learned so much about the political and cultural situation in Latin America, and this gives me a chance to actively participate in the area," Denell said. "I have a lot of book knowledge, but I don't have practical experience."

Peak said the participants in the summer 1992 program will be chosen in mid-November.

New rule not fair to Cats

After preseason polls picked K-State to finish last in the Big Eight Conference, bowl hopes seemed out of reach for yet another football season.

And with a chance to finish 7-4 — K-State's best record since 1954 — coupled with the possibility of an upper-division conference finish, a bowl may still be out of reach.

For the past few weeks, fans have learned of a new NCAA rule that says a team must defeat six Division I-A opponents in order to qualify for a postseason bowl game. If K-State wins the two remaining games on its schedule, the Cats will have just five. Wins over Indiana State and Idaho State, both Division I-AA schools, do not count in K-State's quest for a bowl game.

The reason for the rule was to ensure that only the most deserving teams would have a shot at going to a bowl. Unfortunately for the Cats, the NCAA seems to think an upper-division finish in one of the toughest conferences in the nation does not merit a bowl bid.

I know Coach Bill Snyder does not like to put the cart before the horse when it comes to talking about bowl games. But let's play the "What if?" game.

Currently, K-State and KU are tied with 5-4 records. Both teams have 2-3 conference records with two games to go. If K-State won its two remaining games, it would finish 7-4 and guarantee itself a fourth-place league finish.

Suppose KU loses at Colorado this weekend but beats Missouri next week. That would make KU 6-5 overall and 3-4 in the Big Eight. All six of the Jayhawks' wins would come from Division I-A teams, qualifying them for bowl consideration.

In this situation, the NCAA would have to wonder if the most deserving team would go to a bowl game. Although the Cats would only have five Division I-A wins, they would finish with a better overall record, place higher in the conference and have won the meeting between the two teams. If that was the case, then K-State would have to be the more deserving of the two schools.

The NCAA needs to look at the toughness of the overall schedule among its criteria for allowing teams to get invited to a bowl game. All four of the Cats' losses have been to ranked opponents.

Some teams will qualify for bowl games with a schedule that is less than competitive. By no fault of their own, some conferences are just tougher than others. But would anyone really want to see a bowl game between Eastern Michigan and Western Kentucky?

Bowls have taken on a new look in the past several years. Companies sponsor bowl games with the hopes of generating money. For that reason, bowl representatives should be able to pick whom they want to represent them in a bowl. K-State would be a better draw than Western Kentucky.

During football media day at the beginning of the year, I asked Michael Smith about his goals for the season. He said he wanted to beat KU, shoot for a winning season and maybe go to a bowl game.

One of his three goals has been met, and another goal is just one win away. If K-State wins its two remaining games on the schedule, then rule or no rule, it deserves to go to a bowl game.

The football team can't worry about whether it will go to a bowl game. The Cats can only play games one week at a time. But it sure would be nice to know at the end of the season that, if K-State did not make it to a bowl, it was because the bowl selection committees — instead of the NCAA — thought the Cats didn't deserve it.

All these things made up an October tradition that was as much a part of the K-State culture as Aggieville.

Tickets to see Norris Coleman, Mitch Richmond and Steve Henson were the hottest commodity on campus, and students would go to remarkable lengths to get them.

Basketball ticket campouts were a tradition that brought the University national attention. They demonstrated the student body's enthusiasm for basketball and support of the Wildcats.

This season, however, the campout was dropped, and so has the rush for K-State basketball tickets. The influence of discontinuing the campout on ticket sales is debatable.

The fact that tickets have not sold, however, is not.

Six thousand tickets are set aside each season for students, and the majority of those were sold through the campout. But this year, fewer than 1,600 tickets have been purchased by students, said Carol Adolph, administrative assistant to the athletic department.

"The campout appealed to students as a social event," Adolph said.

It required fans to form large groups in order to compete for tickets. Through the process, ticket sales were quick and predictable. But it had its drawbacks.

The University administration was concerned that the campout detracted from academics, according to Associate Director of Athletics Chris Peterson. The campout typically lasted at least a week and required a certain number of students to remain at the site overnight and during the class day.

He said there were additional factors that made the campout unfavorable to the administration. Among them were concerns for the campers' health and safety because of unpredictable weather, the party atmosphere surrounding the campsite and damage to Ahearn's lawn.

Because of these consequences of Members of student living groups, basketball players and K-State coach Dana Altman have all said they would like see the return of the annual season basketball-ticket campout. The event was canceled this year after polls taken at games last season showed students favored a change.

the campout, the athletic department conducted a poll at three home basketball games last season seeking students' opinions of alternative ticket-selling methods.

The poll, which offered no specific alternative, was greeted by a 2-1 response in favor of considering dropping the campout process. With that vote as the determining factor, the athletic sales committee, comprised of students, began developing a new system.

"We were told when we came together (as a committee in March), the campout was over," said Chairman Kent Calhoun, senior in finance. "It wasn't going to be approved, and we had to come up with an alternate option."

The committee and the athletic department, using input from the student poll, produced the system currently in place. Calhoun said it is designed to distribute tickets more fairly and easily than the campout did.

"I thought it was a hard position to be put in as the ones to have to replace the campout, but I think we came up with the best alternative considering the situation," Calhoun said. "I think the administration had the right to do it (discontinue the campout) because of the damages being done to Ahearn and the cost of cleaning up the area."

Calhoun said the new system does not seem popular. He pointed to other factors that could be contributing to declining sales, but he said the campout was a highly visible and popular tradition.

"I'm not real sure what the general feeling of the students is," he said. "I've heard a mixed response from the people I've talked to. I think with the weather the way it has been, it's probably better that we're not doing it, but I know some people are disappointed."

To compete in the campout, large groups were usually formed and tickets were sold in large blocks. Groups that organized in residence halls and greek houses traditionally purchased tickets in large quantities.

"I just think the campout was a great way to get people excited and to show support for the basketball team," said

Matt Kennedy, senior in animal sciences and industry, who helped organize groups in Haymaker Hall for past campouts. "Without that, it's going to be hard to get people motivated to buy tickets."

"People don't see it as a social activity, and they don't see their friends doing it, so they aren't buying them, either."

Christi Shmidt, senior in elementary education, organized a group from Gamma Phi Beta sorority to campout last year. The house's interest in purchasing tickets has greatly decreased this year, she said.

"Last year we had a group that bought about 50 tickets," Shmidt said. "This year, I think we have about 20 that have tickets. The campout was a lot of fun, and it got everyone together. That was part of the fun of getting basketball tickets."

Particular concern for halting the campout has reached K-State players and coaches.

"Personally, if it were my decision, we'd have the campout," Coach Dana Altman said. "It's great for recruiting, and it's great for our basketball program. I know our team enjoys it, serving chili and talking with the students. It's just part of our tradition at K-State."

Though the team has only taken the court once thus far this season, the drop-off in student ticket sales has not gone unnoticed.

"I think that kind of offset things a little bit," senior forward Wylie Howard said. "This is my fourth year here, and it seems like they sort of took the spirit out of things. As far as the camping out goes, you have to do what it takes to get them (the students) there."

The athletic department emphasizes that judging the new system by sales now may be inconclusive.

"You can't call it a lack of support until we play Texas-San Antonio in our first regular-season game," Peterson said. "Students may just be feeling that there's no need to rush out and buy tickets this early."

Tickets will be available to students for $80 until K-State plays its first regular season game Nov. 23.

Seniors reach the end

Highs, lows

throughout careers

Four years ago, it would have been hard to convince anybody in Kansas — not to mention the rest of the country — that in three years, the Wildcat football program would be in a position to win seven games in a season.

Now it seems as if the program is getting ready to make the jump into the seven-to-eight-win plateau, and perhaps down the line, even nine wins.

"The difference between the first year and this year is like night and day," senior wide receiver Frank Hernandez said. "I wouldn't have believed the change possible if somebody said it to me then."

All this may have been for naught had Hernandez not caught one pass. It was a touchdown reception on the final play of the game against North Texas State in 1989, which gave K-State its first win in 30 outings.

But it meant more than just a win.

"I think that play made a big impact on us as younger players," Hernandez said. "It said we can win and that we did have the ability to win. That put a positive attitude into us for the first time in a long time."

"But ask me if I could make that kind of play again. I don't think so."

Senior Cats

K-State's 18 seniors will play their final home game Saturday against Missouri. The group has helped the Cats snap a 30-game winless streak, 30-game road losing streak, 27-game Big Eight winless streak and led K-State to nine home victories the last two seasons.

This weekend, though, all of the seniors will be trying to duplicate the emotion of that weekend three years ago. Eighteen seniors will play their final home game against the Missouri Tigers.

"These kids have not participated on a winning football program since they got here," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "None of them have."

"We're talking about fourth-year seniors and fifth-year seniors who have not participated in this kind of thing. None of these guys, until three years ago, had taken part in a winning football game. A lot of things have taken place since then, and now they have the opportunity to be on a winning football team."

Snyder said this game will probably be the most important game in the seniors' career. Hernandez agreed.

"One and over I can sit back and say that I have done a lot and accomplished a lot while I was here," Hernandez said. "I'm not going to be thinking about what I've done while I was here until after the game. Afterwards, I'm sure it will hit me what all has taken place."

One person who has seen the changes with Hernandez has been his roommate Michael Smith.

Both Smith and Hernandez said the main difference in the program has been the attitude change of the veterans and the positive attitude brought in by the newcomers.

"When coach got here, we had a bad attitude," Smith said. "Nobody really cared that much. We just went out there and played."

"Now the difference between then and now can't be measured," he added.

Cotton Bowl scenario revealed

By the Associated Press

DALLAS — The Cotton Bowl is trying to nail down all its options for a guest team on New Year's Day with its best hope coming if No. 2 Miami upsets No. 1 Florida State on Saturday.

Florida State has told the Cotton Bowl it would like to play in Dallas if the Seminoles lose to the Hurricanes.

If Florida State wins Saturday, however, the Cotton Bowl would have to scramble. Alabama, ranked seventh, has reportedly cast its lot to the Blockbuster Bowl where it would meet Miami.

No. 8 Penn State reportedly was Fiesta-Bowl-bound, which would leave the Cotton Bowl with the Big Eight Conference runnerup, either No.

16 Colorado or No. 11 Nebraska, should Florida State win.

Oklahoma also was still in the picture. The No. 18th-ranked Sooners, who play in Dallas every year against Texas, have never played in the Cotton Bowl on New Year's Day.

The Southwest Conference will provide the host team.

to beat Miami
when it counts

Hurricanes ready for in-state battle

By the Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Florida State coach Bobby Bowden can count many successes in his 16 seasons with the Seminoles. Beating archrival Miami when it matters most isn't one of them.

No game in Florida State history has meant more than Saturday's 11 a.m. contest between the top-ranked Seminoles and No. 2 Miami in Tallahassee.

"We've been here a few times, and we've always come out the loser," Bowden said Tuesday. "Maybe that's why we won't panic, because we've never won in the past and we can't go downhill."

Since the 1976 season, Bowden has lost 10 of his 15 meetings with the Hurricanes, including five of the last six. Twice — in 1987 and 1988 — a loss to Miami marked the lone blemish on the Florida State schedule, robbing the Seminoles of likely No. 1 finishes.

"They've cost us a few championships," Bowden said. "I think they've probably had more star players than we've had. They've sure deserved everything they've gotten."

Miami won national titles in 1983, 1987 and 1989. Ironically, Florida State's 24-10 victory in 1989 didn't stop Miami from taking the championship that year.

"The biggest thing about the rivalry is the way it's grown on a national scope. It's not just a backyard brawl like it was in the first 20 years or however long it's been going on," Bowden said.

Actually, the two schools have met 34 times with the Hurricanes winning 20. Miami coach Dennis Erickson said the rivalry continues in the off-season.

"The state of Florida's probably got as many big-time football athletes, or more, than anywhere in the country," Erickson said. "It's an in-state game and we go against each other in recruiting."

Bowden said he's just happy to get to the game and not have to worry about being distracted by it while preparing for lesser opponents.

"There was pressure last week to win when you're favored by 25 points. As far as coaching's concerned, there's not that much pressure. There's no chance of looking ahead," he said.

This year's game, which will be shown nationally by ABC-TV, will have a major effect on the New Year's Day bowl picture. The winner is likely to head for the Orange Bowl. Florida State would probably go to the Cotton Bowl if it loses, while Miami could go there or to the Blockbuster Bowl with a loss.

While this year's game against Miami once again has national title implications, Bowden pointed out that Florida State must still face No. 5 Florida in its Nov. 30 season finale. But Bowden said his team could still be in the running for the championship if it loses to the Gators.

That would depend on what happened to Washington, Miami and Michigan in bowl games, he said.

"I think some people would have to get beat that I don't think are going to get beat," Bowden said. "We couldn't control it. I think luck would be a big factor then."

Jardine residents angry about parking permits

Regulations require expense, which is unforeseen by many

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Residents are angry about having to pay to park at Jardine, much less having to buy a second permit to park on the main part of campus.

Current parking regulations require residents to buy a Jardine permit for $25 per semester. They may add general campus parking with a student or faculty/staff permit for $5.

For Stacey Bailey, freshman in electrical engineering, parking was an unforeseen expense that meant she and her family would have to get by with one vehicle.

"I can understand having to pay to park on campus," Bailey said. "That's OK because all of the students have to do that."

But Bailey said she doesn't think it's right to have to pay to park in front of her own apartment.

"To have both cars, we would have to pay $110 per year — that's $50 times two, plus $10 for one on-campus permit," Bailey said.

Other couples can get by with buying one general student permit for $50, Bailey said.

Bailey said her family depends on student loans and the money she earns working 13 hours per week on campus.

"I thought living at Jardine was supposed to be cheaper, but we're paying more here than we paid in Topeka to rent a house."

Timothy Conner, graduate in regional and community planning, said that he also decided to live at Jardine because it was less expensive than another apartment he was considering. When he moved in, he was upset to find out he would have to buy a parking permit.

"That's the system, I guess. I live here because it's cheap, and then I found out about the ticket, and it burned me," Conner said. "You pay rent, you have a right to live here, but only if you don't have an automobile. It seems like they're trying to discourage people from having cars."

Not everyone is complaining. Graduate students Pete and Amy Moran said they were surprised about having to pay for parking, but they still thought they were getting a good deal.

"Our rent is so cheap here — that's why we don't mind having to pay to park," said Amy Moran, graduate in special education.

Dwain Archer, assistant director of parking services, said Jardine residents have to buy a permit because Jardine, like the residence halls, is part of campus, and the same rules apply. Students who live in the residence halls also have to pay $25 per semester to park.

The only difference, Archer said, is that students living in residence halls, except Edwards, must park in their assigned lots and are not allowed to buy general parking permits. This is to make room in the general lots for those who live further away.

Jardine and Edwards residents, on the other hand, are allowed to buy a general permit because of their distance from campus.

They pay extra for the general permit because they have the advantage of having an assigned lot, something other students don't have, Archer said.

"No one can park in their lots, but they can park in general student lots with a general permit," Archer said, "so they are getting a benefit other students don't get."

Jardine residents don't see much of an advantage in having their own lot since it is often hard to find a convenient parking space, especially in the congested area around buildings "H," "I," "M" and "N."

"Once you pay, you're not guaranteed a place," Conner said.

Bailey said paying to park wouldn't be so bad if they could at least have one assigned space in front. Carrying groceries with a seven-month-old in hand, often means several trips to the car parked more than 50 feet away.

Manager Ted Whitson said parking is adequate, but everyone wants to park in front and have more than one vehicle.

Susanne Tunstall, family housing coordinator said tenants are only supposed to park one vehicle in front and one in the adjoining overflow lot.

Lectureship established to honor Kling L. Anderson

Students, faculty provided opportunity to meet with scholars

By the Collegian Staff

Both students and faculty will be provided the opportunity to interact with scholars through the newly established Kling L. Anderson Lectureship.

The first lecture will be 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Throckmorton 131.

Lowell Moser, professor of agronomy at the University of Nebraska, will deliver the lecture. His topic, "Grass Establishment — Germination, Seedling Morphology and Competition," will reflect his leadership and experience in the forage and range area.

The lectureship was established to honor Anderson, former leader of the pasture management program in the Department of Agronomy, said Clenton Owensby, professor of agronomy.

Owensby said that Anderson accomplished many things during his time at K-State.

Anderson provided extremely important worldwide research in the ranching industry and pioneered research on fire effects in grasslands, Owensby said.

He published a landmark paper on range-site classification that is still used today by governmental agencies and developed several grass varieties used by the Federal Conservation Reserve program.

Anderson was a member of the American Society of Agronomy and was selected as an honorary member of the Soil Conservation Society of America, Owensby said.

He said one of Anderson's most important contributions was the effect donations ban will be extended to all civilians, including military reservists who have returned to civilian jobs. Also covered will be business people and tourists who visited Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq, Bahrain, Qatar, United Arab Emirates, Oman or Yemen.

Doddridge predicted the ban would result in a shortfall of blood on military bases, which would affect the public blood supply if it eventually has to compensate for the military deficit.

This week's meeting of blood bank officials is intended to discuss ways of protecting the nation's blood supply from AIDS contamination and reassuring a nervous public about the safety of transfusions.

"We want to assure the public of the safety and quality of the blood supply. I think those are the two issues facing blood banks we will live with for the next few years," Don Doddridge, president of the association said.

The association's 2,400 member agencies collect almost two-thirds of the nation's blood supply and are responsible for 80 percent of transfusions.

The announcement last week that basketball star Magic Johnson is infected with the AIDS virus has heightened awareness but should not raise concerns about acquiring the disease through a transfusion, association officials said.

Johnson's doctor has said Johnson became infected by engaging in unsafe heterosexual activity.

"I do think the way in which he's doing it will be helpful in heightening public awareness of the risks involved," said Dr. Toby Simon, past president of the association and president of Blood Systems Inc. in Scottsdale, Ariz.

ELECTION Q&A

McCLASKEY VS. WINGERT

The student body president for 1991-93 will be chosen today.

The choice is between Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics and international studies, and Fred Wingert, junior in business administration.

Both are overachievers of sorts. Wingert has been involved in student government since he came to K-State as a freshman. He has been involved in the Community Save project, the University's Strategic Planning Committee and various other committees. He has been the Alumni Affairs Director on Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt's cabinet.

McClaskey has been involved in many different groups within her college, such as Ag Ambassadors, the College of Agriculture's Representatives and the Ag college's council. She, too, has been involved with the University's Strategic Planning Committee, as well as the All-University Leadership Development Planning Committee. She has been a senator for two years, and she is one of the University's Truman scholar nominees.

Voting will be on the second floor of the Union all day today.

COLLEGIAN: How do you feel about increasing fees, and how do you feel about funding campus groups such as BaGa's, HALO and other special interest campus groups?

McCLASKEY: The fees we have considered up to this point have been very important, and I don't think any of those shouldn't have been started or continued. As fees are looked at more and more in the future, we need to consider the fee structure. I've had a lot of students talk to me about whether we should consider user fees on some of our programs, because some students benefit a great deal more from some of the fees than others do. Before any major fee increases are considered in the future, we need to consider the user-fee issue.

As far as funding groups such as the ones you mentioned, the way our fee structure is set up I can understand why some students are concerned. They don't believe in some of the things these groups represent. Personally, I don't think there's any group that has come before Senate at this time that should not receive funding due to the political reasons that have been discussed. We should continue to fund these groups.

One option the committee that looked at some of these groups discussed was, allowing students that didn't want to be part of this or were not supporting some of the groups mentioned, to come in and actually sign something that says, "I am not a legal member of SGA." Whether or not this is something that is going to happen, I'm not sure.

WINGERT: It's important when we look at funding groups we look at what the educational value is to the students and if the students are actually going to benefit. It's very, very important when groups come into student government that they feel like they've been treated fairly and treated in a congenial way. We've had problems in the past with groups coming in to student government and leaving feeling like they hadn't got a fair shake.

It's important when they come in they understand what the process is they are going to go through. We're going to ask tough questions about what they'll be doing and what they're going to be doing with the money. Things like that. It's very, very important when we are raising fees and looking at student fees to make sure — whether it's for Student Publications, Recreational Services, whatever we're raising money for — students do benefit. It's very, very important students will see benefits from groups that receive funds from student money. Like the engineering fee, specifically. Half that money is going back to students for things like computers. I was not for the engineering fee, I would have rather seen a systemwide fee so we didn't pit the business college against the College of Arts and Sciences — one college against another. That's where I was coming from on the engineering fee. If students are benefiting, it will be worth it to raise fees.

COLLEGIAN: This is kind of just a hypothetical question. If you were in the situation that Todd Heitschmidt was in, with the furniture and everything and in other things that he's done in his administration, what would you have done differently?

WINGERT: The student body president needs to set priorities that are important to students. I don't think it was a real big concern to students that we had the best furniture here in the office. But the situation, looking at it in hindsight, the proper channels should have been gone through to get the furniture. It should have been budgeted in when we first sat down and decided we needed to renovate the SGA offices. I was for renovating the office, but I was under the understanding we were going to be loaned $65,000, and that's all we were going to be spending. That wasn't the case.

It's important that you go through the proper channels. As student body president, you need to set your priorities as to their importance to students and follow through on what is really important to students.

When Todd was elected, I don't think office renovations was one of those priorities he was talking about. I think it was more along the lines of the library, campus safety, campus shuttle system. Some of the issues he was touching on during his campaign were things you want to carry through on.

McCLASKEY: Many people were under the impression when we allocated the $65,000 in a loan to the Union that we understood that money would take care of office renovation. No other student dollars would go into the renovation. There was some major miscommunication. Who all was involved in that was questionable. But the fact is, at some point, Student Senate, as well as those involved in student government, misunderstood what was going to take place. We thought the furniture had been included.

Put in the position Todd was in this summer, the proper channels should have been used. Somewhere a mistake was made. I don't know if anyone's ever going to know who was the first person to say, "Go ahead and purchase the furniture," or "It's not going to matter, we can do it this way." I don't know if Todd is the one person to blame or if we're going to know who that one person is.

The proper channels should have been used. Whoever's elected as student body president is going to be careful of that. It's very important to students. That's why these channels exist — so the decisions made are as fair to students as possible.

COLLEGIAN: Another issue that was brought up during this past year was the thought of a shuttle service for students. How important is that?

McCLASKEY: The idea of a shuttle system is extremely important. Obviously, there's a parking problem on campus. It's our job to find the most effective, cost-efficient way to solve that problem. It's going to come down to the students and each and every one of us paying to solve the parking problem. The shuttle is going to be the most cost-effective answer.

I'm in favor of a communitywide shuttle system. And using the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and other groups throughout the community to help us create support for such a system. Students can benefit more from a community system, and it's more likely such a system would gain support not only from the campus, but from the entire community.

WINGERT: I would say as I've talked to students, especially off-campus students, they're extremely concerned about the fact that we don't have a shuttle system. We have a huge parking problem. It's a huge problem on campus. What I'd like to see done is a shuttle system utilizing the engineering department's electric van. I'd like to pursue federal grant money and encourage the administration to pursue federal grant money to purchase, say, 15 of these vans.

Let's utilize our engineering department, one of the top engineering departments in the country. Let's get those people in the engineering department who are very good at raising federal funds for projects to go to Washington and get that money back here at K-State and solve a couple different problems. No. 1: we can test whether these electric vans really work. No. 2: we can solve the campus parking problem.

There's millions of dollars of federal money available to test energy conservation and pollution. These electric vans would do that. Maybe we could get General Motors to work with us. It's probably a $250,000 - $300,000 commitment. Somebody's going to have to make it in my opinion. I don't want to see a lot of student dollars go into this.

COLLEGIAN: Another concern that's come up in the past year is the idea of a minors program. People, I guess administrators mostly, have said there's not enough student interest. How do you two respond to that?

WINGERT: There's a tremendous amount of student interest in it. Students are concerned we don't have a minors program at K-State. We're the only Big Eight school that doesn't have a minors program. There's a couple of things that are important to remember. Graduates from K-State need to be as marketable as possible. I'm a junior in business finance. A student from KU who is also a business finance major can have a minor in marketing. I can't. I have to get a dual degree and get additional hours that equal more than a minors program.

A minors program is definitely recognized by employers. There are some costs associated with that for the University, but I think in the long run it will make our graduates certainly more in demand. That's extremely important. Currently there's a proposal in Student Senate. It has been bogged down. I spoke with people in the administration, the provost, and he has said he thinks it is something that can be accomplished.

McCLASKEY: The academic minors program is something students have shown an interest in for many years. It was first passed through Senate with Senate recommending that a minors program be implemented years ago. But I don't feel our end of the deal has been kept up. Students have issued a concern, and student government hasn't taken steps to make sure something has happened to answer that concern.

I definitely see a need for a minors program. My fellow students are concerned about it. A lot of students decide to go ahead and take classes outside of their major and get an emphasis in a certain area. They list that on their resume, and they tell people about it in interviews. It really doesn't have the impact of saying "I have a minor degree." When they can't get a minor, they get a secondary degree like I have chosen or a dual degree. In most cases, it's going to lengthen your time you spend here. I don't think that's something as students we should be asked to do.

The minors program should be available to enhance our education by specializing outside our major without that added burden of increased tuition and time.

COLLEGIAN: Is there any way to make student government more efficient?

McCLASKEY: To make it more efficient, it first has to be made more effective. And to make student government more effective, we're going to have to involve more students in the decision-making process. So when controversies come up and decisions have to be made, if there's more students coming in, the input is more clear as to what the overall student concerns are. By involving all types of groups across campus, whether it be living organizations, different multicultural student groups, the colleges, we get their members more involved in the decision-making process. Whether that means individual students coming to Senate or having a meeting with these groups once a month and discussing.

Robots researched, developed at K-State

Analytical Director is ongoing project in chemistry department

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Computer-linked robots capable of performing analytical procedures are being researched and developed in the Department of Chemistry.

"I believe K-State's robotics program is the leading one of its kind," said Thomas Isenhour, professor of chemistry.

The Analytical Director is an ongoing project aimed at combining artificial intelligence and lab robots into a system that can design, simulate, test and implement its own analytical procedures.

Isenhour and Maria Zamfir-Bleyberg, assistant professor of computer and information sciences, developed the robotics system with six years of support from the National Science Foundation.

Isenhour began researching the project in 1985 at Utah State University. When he came to K-State in 1987, he brought the project with him and introduced robotics research to the chemistry department.

Zamfir-Bleyberg joined the research efforts in 1988.

"My part is the conceptual part,"

she said. "It's very sophisticated."

Zamfir-Bleyberg directs the computer programming, which activates the robot's movements.

Graduate students in the departments of chemistry and computing sciences are involved in the project under the direction of Isenhour and Zamfir-Bleyberg.

The robot consists of an arm that can select from several hands to operate lab instruments. The arm is linked to a computer, which controls its actions.

The process begins with the human programmer designing the experimental procedure on the computer. The computer sets up the procedure and activates the robotic system, which in turn performs the procedure.

Robots are a solution to the problem of too few expert analytical chemists, Isenhour said. Research can be conducted in labs that don't have the necessary human technicians through the use of robot technicians.

By eliminating the human variable, he said, robots can ensure the standardization of procedures and experiments in labs all over the world.

"Robots perform procedures more efficiently and accurately than humans," Isenhour said.

Unlike humans who put in 8-hour workdays, a robot can put in a 24-hour workday, and a robot requires no training.

Robots are, however, very limited in vision.

"They can't deal with unexpected circumstances such as broken containers," Isenhour said.

Dealing with such problems is part of the continuing research being done by the project's researchers.

The use of robotics is becoming more and more prevalent in laboratories and industries around the world, Isenhour said.

This increased use of robotics, he said, is causing a great need for experts in the field.

The Analytical Director is giving graduate students in the departments of chemistry and computer sciences the opportunity to gain experience in the field of robotics.

It was the topic of a keynote lecture given by Isenhour at the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry 1991 World Chemical Congress in August.

Report discusses 'rubbish'

Bush accused of seeking collapse of Chinese Communism

By the Associated Press

LONDON — A confidential report being circulated among Chinese officials accuses President Bush of seeking the collapse of Chinese Communism, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported Tuesday. It says Western talk of human rights is "rubbish."

The Chinese document, written in October, notes that Bush successfully opposed attempts this year by members of Congress to deprive China of its most-favored-nation trading privileges with the United States, according to the BBC.

But the document quotes Bush as saying he supported a continuation of trade agreement because broader contacts with China would help export the ideals of democracy and freedom, the report said.

The Chinese government argued strongly for the renewal of its U.S. trading privileges. It was unclear if the document quoted by the BBC represented widespread private suspicions over the trade agreement within the Chinese leadership, or was the work of hard-liners who opposed broader contacts with the West.

The report of the document came in advance of a visit to China this week by Secretary of State James Baker III. Human rights issues are expected to be on his agenda.

The document charged that Bush and domestic critics of his China policy actually share the same aim of trying to turn China capitalist, according to the report by BBC Beijing correspondent James Miles.

It says that by using the term "human rights movement" to describe the Tiananmen Square uprising against Chinese authorities, the United States and other Western countries proved their talk of human rights is "rubbish."

Gypsy
Saturday, November 23, 8 p.m.

The memoirs of stripper Gypsy Rose Lee suggested this fable of a steamrolling stage mother who, in Kenneth Tynan's words "was forever pressing her children's noses to the grindstone of her own frustrated ambitions." Gypsy will transport you to the tough and sleazy world of vaudeville through the magic of a Broadway musical in the grand tradition. Arthur Laurents' book is first-rate, Stephen Sondheim's lyrics are right on the mark, and Jule Styne's score is his finest. So, as Rose's daughters would have put it, "Let us entertain you!"

"Best damn musical I've seen in years."

State budget battles begin

Lawmakers disagree on where to make cuts, but agree not across-the-board

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — A panel of lawmakers was unable to reach any agreement Tuesday on where to make cuts in the state budget after the Legislature convenes in January.

STATE BUDGET

However, most members of the Special Committee on Ways and Means and Appropriations agreed, however, that across-the-board cuts are not the way to bring state spending under control. Gov. Joan Finney made such cuts this summer, amounting to 1 percent of the budget, after vetoing a tax package.

An assortment of other possible options was discussed, including freezing the salaries of state employees, cutting unspecified programs and creating a "rainy day" fund for agencies hardest hit by budget cuts.

Lawmakers did not dwell on the possibility of passing a tax increase similar to one the Legislature sent to Finney in May. That bill, containing sales and income tax increases, would have raised $138.3 million.

House Democrats, members of Finney's own political party, led an unsuccessful attempt to override the veto.

"I think we're engaging in self-pity in this," said Rep. Al Lane, R-Mission Hills, after some committee members complained about budget cuts made last year. "People do not want tax increases."

Rep. Steve Lloyd, R-Palmer, suggested that money could be saved by freezing the salaries of state employees.

"The perception in my district is that state employees are well paid, and that's a place to save money, rather than cutting programs," he said.

Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita,

Balancing the budget

A panel of lawmakers came up with several ideas, but not much agreement, on how to cut the state budget after the Legislature convenes in January. Some of the ideas are listed below.

- Freezing salaries of state employees
- Cutting unspecified programs
- Creating a fund for agencies hardest hit by budget cuts disputed Lloyd's suggestion that state workers are well paid. Any budget cuts, he said, should be made selectively.

Lloyd said, "We've got to think of where we can actually make cuts, whether they are cuts at the state level or local level."

Rep. David Heinemann, R-Garden City, suggested that the Legislature create a fund that certain state agencies would be able to draw from if there are more across-the-board cuts. He said such cuts hurt certain state agencies much worse than others.

He said such a fund would act as a safety net for those agencies that are hardest hit by such cuts.

Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, said the Legislature needs to cut the state budget by one percent, or about $26 million, to avoid a tax increase. He is chairman of the committee.

The committee plans to resume its discussion Wednesday morning.

Bush urges cuts in credit card rates

President hopes to revive the nation's sagging economy

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — President Bush urged credit card issuers to cut interest rates Tuesday to help revive the nation's sagging economy and accused Democrats of sending his legislative prescriptions to "liberal limbo."

Speaking at a fund-raiser for his still-unofficial re-election campaign, Bush blended an attack on the Democrats with a fresh prescription for the economy, which has not rebounded strongly from recession as the administration had hoped.

"Right now the signals are mixed" on the economy, he said.

Bush, who had previously pressed banks to lower a variety of consumer rates, took aim this time at credit-card rates that are commonly in the 18 percent to 19 percent range. That is 10 percentage points or more above the 7.5-percent prime rate that banks charge their most credit worthy customers.

"I'd frankly like to see the credit card rates down. I believe that would help stimulate the consumer and get the confidence moving again," Bush said.

Bush spoke a day after a fresh poll showed his job performance approval rating down 6 points in the past month and 29 points since spring — a drop blamed for the most part on job layoffs and other problems of the slumbering economy.

In a fire-breathing partisan speech, Bush made clear that he is back on the campaign trail.

He told a New York luncheon audience that Americans are weary of the Democratic-controlled Congress, its "endless appetite for sideshows that have really kind of embarrassed our country" and lawmakers' "over-indulgence in perks and privileges."

He blamed Congress for blocking his proposals on transportation, energy, unemployment and crime, saying: "Sometimes I get this sinking feeling that the Democrats believe that they can win only if times are bad. They have a vested interest in seeing us fail."

He said he has asked Congress three times to enact "economic measures that I believe are sound" to promote growth, such as capping damages in legal suits, approving enterprise zones to give incentives to businesses in inner cities and cutting the capital gains tax to spur investment.

"Three times in three years, the leadership up on the Hill sent those initiatives into a liberal limbo up there," he said.

The Democrats responded in kind. "I don't think that he has offered any sense of leadership on any of the issues that might be able to pull us out of the economic mess that we are in," said House Majority Leader Richard Gephardt, in Washington. "If he has been mugged, he has been mugged by his own unwillingness to lead."

Gephardt said Bush has twice blocked efforts to cut unemployment benefits and keeps pushing for a capital gains tax cut for the wealthy but no tax break for the middle class — indications he is "frozen by his insensitivity to what people are feeling."

And Rep. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., accused Bush of hypocrisy in the call for lower credit card rates, contending the administration has opposed legislation aimed at bringing them down.

"It seems that only when he drops in the popularity polls does he wake up to the real problems," Schumer said in an interview.

Bush made his comments at a $2.2 million fund-raiser, the third in a series of galas with the Republican Party's elite as he builds his campaign war chest before making the formal announcement that he will seek a second term.

Rebutting criticism that he has neglected domestic problems while spending most of his energy on foreign affairs, Bush said it is Congress that is "out of step with the times and out of touch with the heartbeat" of the country.

The lectureship was made available to K-State through donations by family, friends and associates to Anderson. To date, more than $7,400 has been given to the lectureship fund, but additional contributions are still encouraged.

Owensby said the department's goal is to bring individuals on the cutting edge of their field to the lecture series.

"We want to stimulate higher quality research and better understand the research done in the world," he said.

that's not the whole idea for that position," he said. "They're there on cabinet to develop the position."

Wingert said he doesn't remember who approached whom, but the creation of the position was more of a mutual decision.

"He was interested in having me on cabinet, and I was interested in being on his cabinet," he said. "We had talked about common goals for tapping into alumni support."

we can find out how one group can help another.

There has to be greater communication between groups, and through that we can make student government more effective. Then we'd truly be serving the students, and the students' concerns would be heard. That way we could actually help the student body. That way we could make student government more efficient.

WINGERT: It's important to understand that the words are actually Student Government Services. We have an office here to serve the students. It's important that incoming students understand where we are and what we do. I'd like to see the campus tours that are conducted be brought through the SGA offices so students understand what is here, what is available. We have a student attorney our fees pay for. We have a student body president that is elected to represent us. We have Student Senate that we can get elected to. I was very fortunate when I was a freshman to be involved in student government when most sophomores and juniors don't understand what SGA really is.

What I'd also like to see is that student government go more out to people. We can be more effective than we are just sitting in this office. I'd like to see the Student Senate meeting taken out of the Big 8 room on occasion, not every week. Maybe it can be held in Derby Food Center, maybe it can be held in Kramer Food Center. Or possibly in an off-campus location if it's large enough. That's a step.

SGA can be more effective if we unify all our students and student leaders and groups and bring them together and solve our common goals, our common problems. It's important to do that, to get everyone unified. We all agree we want a better library. We all agree we want better campus safety. Probably 90 percent of students would agree we want a minors program. A very significant portion of students would agree we want a shuttle system. Together let's unify and solve these common problems.

COLLEGIAN: Since you both addressed diversity earlier, how important is multicultural diversity to you, and how would you encourage it within the University?

WINGERT: Multicultural diversity to me is very important. When I set up my campaign I set up a very diverse core group with multicultural interests, with interests from residence halls, with off-campus interests. I will continue to do that with my cabinet. Two years ago under Todd Johnson, we had a multicultural affairs director. That was not continued this year on the cabinet. That is a concern of mine.

We need to look at how candidates set up their campaign. That's indicative of how they're going to set up their cabinet. My campaign manager was co-facilitator of the harmony walk. Another person on my core group was the co-chair of the entire Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Diversity was important to me when I selected people to start up my campaign. I will continue to do so in the future. There will certainly be a significant proportion of multicultural representation on my cabinet and in student government.

McCLASKEY: The more I'm involved in student government, the more I see a need for diversity in student government. I considered this as well when I set up my staff, and I have worked with groups across campus in getting input about what the students' concerns are, what the mood is, to create a better understanding between the different interest groups.

Diversity, whether by living organization, or by culture, doesn't matter. Diverse groups should be working together, working on projects together so when it comes time for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week there will be members from groups all across campus taking part in the week. This can be done with the panel discussion I mentioned earlier, getting different members from groups all across campus together to meet once a month and discuss the issues that are important to them, as well as other planned functions they have. This will create communication and cooperation.

We can't just do it in student government. It needs to be campuswide in areas outside the student-government realm, if they truly want to make a difference. Diversity is something that not enough emphasis has been placed on in the past. The answer is going out to these groups and saying, "We need your input. We want to know your concerns and how the decisions we are making will affect you." We need their input to help us make those decisions.

COLLEGIAN: This is another two-part question. Do either of you trust the administration? And I want you both to assume you've been elected president. What are you going to do if, tomorrow, President Wefald comes out with a statement saying, "This college," any college on campus, "is going to be closed."?

McCLASKEY: If I'm elected it's my duty to trust the administration in that respect. If we start out with a level of distrust, we're not going to get anywhere. The only way we can accomplish anything is by cooperating. That doesn't mean the student body president needs to bow down to the administration. I don't mean that at all. There has to be a sense of mutual respect. If that respect isn't there, and if we don't listen to what the administration has to say, then they're not going to listen to us. They have the opportunity to make decisions that have a greater impact than what we do. You have to listen to what they have to say.

As far as what I would do if that statement was made, I would obviously react to that immediately. Because, one, Fred and I both have been involved with strategic planning, and that decision was not discussed in that group, and student input was not factored in that decision.

Even this past week I've met with Provost James Coffman and discussed with him getting a greater number of students involved with strategic planning. If a decision like that is going to be made, you need student input. Two, last year, when the student stand, riot, whatever you want to call it, was taken with the College of Architecture, student government didn't take a stand. I don't think that was right.

It was obvious the students were truly concerned, and they wanted to take a stand on the issue and we sat back here in the offices and said, "Look at what our fellow students are doing." It shouldn't have been that way. We should have been a part of it. Whether the administration liked it or not. That would have been representing the students who elected us to that position.

WINGERT: The person who's elected as student body president should not be naive about what the administration is doing. I do trust the administration. But it is important that the student body president be willing to stand up to the administration and be willing to take a stand on whatever the case may be. Student input in a variety of decisions is extremely important.

One of the first things I'm going to do as student body president is ask to sit in on the president's weekly staff meeting. It is important that the student body president does understand what

One of the first things I'm going to do as student body president is ask to sit in on the president's weekly staff meeting. It is important that the student body president does understand what goes on in the administration and this University. Maybe some of the information at these meetings does need to be confidential. But it is important that the direction week by week the University goes has input from students.

We are all going to have some drastic cuts as students over the next six months. I don't think they'll be shutting down any colleges, but there will be cuts made across the entire University. One thing I would say is that students who are in programs in whatever college, whether they're a freshman or a sophomore or whatever, be allowed to finish they're degree if we are going to cut a program. I couldn't honestly sit here and say we're not going to cut programs. Because we probably are going to cut programs. But if we are going to cut programs then it's not fair to have students enroll in those programs and have them cut the next year. I think that's very unjust.

COLLEGIAN: How do you feel about the way the Legislature has been treating the University over the past few years?

WINGERT: To say I'm highly disappointed would be an understatement. It's just unbelievable what has happened to higher education in the last few years. Two years ago, we were supposed to get more than $4 million in enrollment adjustment, and then we got just a little over $2 million. The Legislature encouraged us in 1986 to increase enrollment. They came back in 1990, and they created an incentive for us to do that, and they cut our funds. Compared to last year, we lost $6 million this year. The Legislature ought to be ashamed of itself, the way it has set its priorities.

McCLASKEY: The Kansas Legislature has been very disappointing. They have failed to hold up the promises they have made to students of K-State. One of the most discouraging things was the enrollment adjustment. They did encourage other regents schools, and K-State especially, to increase the number of students we had coming here. We did that, and the benefit we were supposed to receive didn't happen. And now K-State is suffering probably the most of all the regents schools. Our enrollment increased the most, and we have the greatest amount of cuts coming to us.

FRED WINGERT

Dear K-State Students,
Today we as students make an important decision about the future of K-State. Having been involved in numerous activities and committees the past three years, I feel qualified to represent you.
I plan to make a visible difference for students during my term through hard work and bringing ethics back to the office of student body president.
Over the last four weeks I have enjoyed speaking with so many student groups. This has been a great chance to hear students' concerns. As student body president I will act on them.
Please feel free to ask me any questions today on the north side of the Union as I am greeting students there. I would appreciate your vote.

McClaskey wins run-off election

Voter turnout low, but winning margin more than 400

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Jackie McClaskey knew she was the next student body president when she got a telephone call right at 9:30 Wednesday night.

The two candidates, McClaskey and Fred Wingert, were told they would be notified by telephone at 9:30 p.m. as to who won the run-off election.

"They're going to call the winner first," she said before the phone call. "I hope I get a call right at 9:30."

About 30 supporters huddled around McClaskey as she took the call from elections chairwoman Ann Woodbury in Rusty's Outback in Aggieville.

"Ann said she had some news that would please me quite a bit, and I said, 'Just tell me.' She said, 'You won', and that's the last thing I heard," McClaskey said.

Upon hearing the words 'you won,' McClaskey screamed loudly, and then her supporters followed suit by screaming and cheering.

"This is incredible, this is awesome. I'm so happy for Jax," said David Shepard, senior in pre-law and one of McClaskey's campaign managers.

Voter turnout for the election was typically low for a run-off. Even though this election would bring into power a president who would have an extended term of three semesters, only 2,487 students showed up at the polls.

McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics, garnered 1,447 votes, and Wingert, junior in business administration, collected 1,040 votes.

Darin Batchman, Todd Heitschmidt's chief of staff, said run-off elections are usually close.

"Last year, Todd won by 170 votes, and the year before that, Todd Johnson won by, I think, 129," he said. "Jackie won by over 400. That is a romp for a run-off."

McClaskey said she did not know whether she would win or not, but she thought it would be close.

"I was very up in the air about this," she said. "I heard several times that even though Fred won by 900 votes last week, it was going to be a whole new race. And it was."

Shepard said having no referendums on the ballot worked in McClaskey's favor.

"Last week, I think the reason why some people voted for Fred was because they had a better organized campaign than ours in getting his name out," he said. "People came to vote for the referendums and recognized his name more. This time, student body president was the only issue. The numbers speak for themselves."

McClaskey said she saw no problems in having her victory party at the Outback, even though she was pictured in last week's Collegian doing a shot there.

"I thought if there was going to be alcohol available, we should have it in a professional place where my staff and I would not be held responsible for who was drinking," she said. "It's just a decision we all made together."

McClaskey said she is unsure whether the picture had any effect on the election outcome, but it definitely gave her some publicity.

"Even when I call for delivery food, they say, 'Do you want a shot with that?'" she said.

Wingert disappointed, but encourages group to support new student body president

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Fred Wingert will not be the next student body president of K-State.

Wingert, junior in business administration, lost Wednesday's run-off election to Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics.

Wingert received a call from Ann Woodbury, junior in business administration and elections chair, at about 9:35 p.m. Wednesday.

"What was the vote?" Wingert asked.

Wingert received 1,040 votes. McClaskey won the election with 1,447.

He then hung up the phone and turned to the group, who still didn't know what the results were.

"When we started this campaign, we knew there were two alternatives," he said. "We knew from the beginning what we had in the weeks ahead."

His supporters could almost guess what his next words were going to be.

"I won't hold you in suspense any longer," Wingert said. "We did not win."

He thanked his campaign supporters for their work.

"I'm very proud of the race we ran — we were honest," he said.

Wingert said there were things that hurt his campaign.

He said he was ripped by the Collegian in several instances in the past few weeks.

"We were dogged in the Collegian," he said. "There were editorials that hurt us."

He said he was proud of the way he ran his campaign.

"This was a very, very worthwhile cause," Wingert said. "I'm highly disappointed in what happened."

He told his group to be supportive of McClaskey in her new role as student body president.

"There'll be other opportunities," Wingert said. "Let's help Jackie in her commitment to Kansas State."

Keats fire survivors upset by arrest, ban from funeral

Editor's note: This story is the second of a series investigating the Sept. 5 trailer fire in which three people were killed. This installment deals with the methods Riley County police department detectives Dan Duckworth and Warren Wright used during the investigation.

KEATS FIRE

Anthony and Scott Moss, the survivors of the fatal Sept. 5 trailer fire near Keats, said they were frustrated and angered by the methods local authorities used to investigate the incident.

Killed in the fire were Julie Clark, 27; her daughter, Jennifer Harper, 9; and her son, Steven Clark, 5.

On the night of the fire, Riley County Police Department Detective Dan Duckworth took statements from the Mosses and other witnesses at the scene. Shortly afterward, the RCPD announced no criminal activity was suspected.

However, two days before the funeral, Anthony Moss was detained by the RCPD for "outstanding warrants," Duckworth said at the time.

At the time, Duckworth acknowledged Moss' detention and said the action was not related to the fire.

"What that jerk did was arrest me for bullshit false arrest charges," Anthony Moss said. "I paid a lawyer $400 to go in and talk to the judges about them. They had been lifted a week before the fire."

Anthony Moss was released shortly after being detained, the reason given to him by the RCPD was the whole incident occurred due to a "computer glitch."

According to Anthony Moss, treatment of him by the arresting officers was wrong.

"It kind of pissed me off the way the whole thing was done," he said. "I tried to tell them that the warrants were dropped, but they didn't care."

"I told them all they had to do was make a phone call, and one of the jailers said, 'No. We're not calling anybody.'"

Capt. Allen Raynor of RCPD said although he had nothing to do with the arrest, the charges, at the time, were legitimate.

"He was arrested on Pottawatomie County charges," Raynor said. "We had a warrant, and it was a current warrant."

"We called the people who issued the warrant for them to come and pick him up."

Duckworth was one of the arresting officers, Anthony Moss said.

When reached at his home for a statement, Duckworth declined comment and said Raynor would make any comments concerning the case.

"Detective Duckworth is not allowed to make any statements regarding this or any case," Raynor said. "As far as Detective Duckworth though, Dan Duckworth is one of the finest officers in this community."

Karren Baird-Olson, instructor of sociology, said the actions taken by the RCPD are consistent with routine criminal investigations.

"What they usually do is make a background check of the people involved," Baird-Olson said. "Usually, the check is done if they are doing a thorough investigation. It could be they (the Mosses) were involved, from RCPD's view."

But Baird-Olson did say, "They were really digging, evidently."

In some cases, it is thought a police department will find a way to detain people it is suspicious of in order to keep them nearby and have time to investigate further. Baird-Olson said this could be construed as one of those cases.

"It has been done," she said of past national case studies. "We know there has been a lot of abuses of police power."

"At RCPD, it could have been a legal snag, or it could be something else. This could be a form of harassment or just a background search made as a part of a follow-up."

According to the Mosses, detective Warren Wright, who was also assigned to the case, had not heard of Anthony Moss' arrest until Moss was brought in.

"Wright stopped me and Scott in the hall after we were arrested to ask us what our problem was," Anthony Moss said.

On the day of the funeral, the Mosses were told by the RCPD's Sgt. Adam Angst they were not welcome at the funeral.

"We were told by Angst that if we showed up at the funeral, we would be Evidence recovery to delay Heintze murder hearing

Soldiers granted continuances in murder cases

Court continuances were granted for two Fort Riley soldiers charged in the murder of K-State freshman Catherine Heintze.

Nathaniel Wayne Ellibee, HHB 1/5 FA, and Jason Lee Turner, HHB 1/5 FA, will have separate preliminary hearings Dec. 6 and Dec. 13, respectively, according to an official from the Geary County Attorney's office.

The first hearing was set for today. A continuance simply means more time was needed by either the prosecuting or defending attorneys.

The official from the county attorney's office said County Attorney Chris Biggs requested a continuance. Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said continuances are quite routine.

"In my 21 years here, I've never seen a court date go the first time," he said.

Deppish said there were many reasons why this case was continued.

"We haven't even recovered all of our evidence yet. Also, our court docket is so full right now, that's one reason anyway," he said. "I've also sent some people to investigate out of state."

The purpose of a preliminary hearing is to ascertain whether or not enough evidence exists to believe the person charged committed the crime.

Deppish said if there is enough evidence, the next step would be to set a trial date and select a jury.

"There is a good possibility neither of the defendants will go to trial," he said. "There may be agreements made."

Miss USA returns to Wichita

WICHITA, Kan. (AP) — The Miss USA pageant will be held here for the third consecutive year, organizers and local officials announced Wednesday.

Mobile, Ala., had been expected to have the 1992 pageant, but it withdrew its bid.

The Feb. 7 pageant finals will be internationally televised from the Century II convention center in Wichita as they were this year and last.

Instead of just the city backing the pageant and getting television exposure, the entire state will be involved, officials said.

Miss USA 1991, Kelli McCarty of Liberal, Kan., said at a Wednesday news conference she was pleased the pageant is returning to her state.

"I am extremely proud of my home state and look forward to February and sharing with our television audience the many faces of Kansas," she said.

Contestants from 50 states and the District of Columbia will compete for the crown and about $200,000 in cash and prizes.

McDonnell-Douglas seeks Asian buyers

ST. LOUIS (AP) — McDonnell Douglas Corp. said Wednesday it is considering selling 40 percent of its commercial aircraft business for up to $2 billion to an Asian partner.

The aerospace giant had said previously it was seeking partners to help launch a new jumbo jet, the MD-12, but had not specified its asking price or what percentage of its business might be sold.

No deal was expected soon, said Pete Sloan, a company spokesman.

News of the proposed deal leaked out Tuesday and the company's stock climbed $4.62 1/2 on the New York Stock Exchange to a two-year high of $77. The stock moved up another $2.12 1/2 to $79.12 1/2 by the close of trading Wednesday.

McDonnell Douglas is the world's second largest maker of commercial jets and has said it expects most of its growth in the coming decades to be in the Pacific Rim.

By selling part of the commercial aircraft business to an Asian partner McDonnell Douglas would gain better access to sales in the region, gain some technology and, most important, gain lots of cash.

McDonnell Douglas had $4.8 billion in debt at the end of the third quarter and the company has said it would have to find an investor to help pay for the MD-12, which would compete with Boeing Co.'s 747.

McDonnell Douglas is on track to derive 40 percent of its $19.5 billion in corporate revenue this year from the sale of commercial airliners.

Bush defends policy to FFA

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — President Bush used a speech to a farm group in the nation's heartland Wednesday to defend his attention to foreign affairs, calling accusations that he is short-changing domestic concerns "hog-wash."

"I will never apologize for a single minute I devote to promoting America's interests abroad," Bush told the National Future Farmers of America Convention.

He described his overseas efforts as work to promote world peace and to open new markets for U.S. farm goods and other products.

Bush also kept up the pummeling of congressional Democrats that has characterized his campaign-like speeches of the past few weeks, asserting that Congress isn't getting the message on his legislative proposals.

In Washington, Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, described Bush's continued attacks on Democrats as "Panic City" for the White House.

Bush was later traveling across the state to St. Louis to attend an evening political fund-raiser for Republican Sen. Christopher Bond.

In Kansas City, he predicted years of political trench warfare on his education bill and accused Congress of dragging its feet on his proposals for lower capital-gains tax rates and for banking overhaul.

But he was the most animated in answering criticism that he spends too much time pursuing foreign instead of domestic policy—a common complaint by Democrats and also a view shared by many Americans, according to public opinion polls.

"That's hogwash," Bush said. "That whole line of argument is misleading."

"I'm sure that you understand that what I'm working at is a real-world approach to creating more jobs and more wealth for Americans in America," Bush told the audience of teen-agers.

The president also said that his dealings with Soviet, Eastern European and Middle Eastern leaders were important in promoting world peace.

Bush recently postponed a 10-day trip to Asia and Australia that was to begin on Thanksgiving, saying he

Meat Judging Team chills out

Practice in refrigerator yields valuable experience

ERIN BURKE
Staff Writer

Ten people clad in standard insulated blue coats pace around inside a giant refrigerator.

The students circle metal tables, all the while scribbling notes vigorously on sheets of paper attached to their clipboards.

They're looking at raw meat — marketable animal carcasses and cuts of meat.

The K-State Meat Judging Team is made up of nine people, all of whom have completed the Principle of Meat Evaluation class.

The team judges, in a contest situation, the quality and composition of meat products, wholesale cuts and whole carcasses. John Unruh, assistant professor of animal sciences, said though every specie is different, the current trend is to judge carcasses and cuts on muscling, trimness and quality.

This means comparing several carcasses or cuts, mostly by sight, on things like lean-to-fat ratio.

In other classes, Unruh said, students judge product workmanship and acceptability. This means, for example, the way the cuts are cut, he said.

The purpose of the team is competition, but students also receive experience that can be applied in real life situations, said Brian Dunn, junior in animal sciences and industry.

"When you have to tell a guy who has been in the industry for 20 years that he is wrong (about the cut of meat), you have to be able to tell him why," Dunn said.

The experience is gained not only from having to judge the meats, Dunn said, but also in the intensive workouts the team is required to attend.

The team practices all day Thursday and Saturday, but will sometimes practice Monday and Fridays as well, Unruh said.

Andy Clawson, junior in animal sciences and industry, said it takes discipline to stay in the coolers that long.

In the spring, when the students began practicing for the team, it was hard to stay in the freezers for more than two hours, he said. Taking notes was especially difficult with numb hands.

Dunn said workouts help train the students to maintain concentration the whole time they are in the coolers. That concentration carries over when the team participates in contests.

"If you lose your concentration or mental stability, you can lose the contest," Dunn said.

At one contest the team attended, a team that took an early lead fell behind other teams later in the competition. The team members lost their concentration, Dunn said, and lost the contest when they went back that afternoon.

Dunn said the workouts are intensive for a reason, but they also do get some breaks.

"When there is a home game, we go to support the Cats, but we have to practice on Friday night to make up for that time," he said.

Being on the meat judging team requires a lot of time, but that isn't the only demand, Dunn said.

"It makes it tough to keep up on school work, and it is hard on grades," Dunn said.

Professors in the College of Agriculture are understanding about missing classes for the contests, Dunn said, but some on the other side of campus don't know what the team is about and aren't always as understanding.

The team GPA, however, is more than 3.0.

Going to the contests is worth it, Clawson said. Not only does the team go for competition, but they also go as ambassadors for K-State, he said.

Participating on the team is hard work, he said, but there are also rewards — like meeting new people.

The last contest the team participated in was the Iowa State Invitational, where they placed first out of eight schools.

Teams are placed by comparing their evaluations to those of the judges on the cuts of meat, Heath Higbie, senior in agribusiness, said.

"Each cut has to be cut specifically, which means removing the muscle and fat," Higbie said.

After the team ranks each cut of meat, they are then given a half an hour to write down reasons for their evaluations, Dunn said. Their evaluations are then compared with the judges'.

OPINION

EDITORIALS

The party's over — time to clean up

Everyone hates to clean up after a stellar keg party. But it's got to be done, or the apartment will smell like beer-soaked ashes.

Well, the party's over, candidates. It's time to clean up campus.

It's been a week since students voted in the general election, yet campaign posters still cover trees, hang from wires and lay wet and dirty along the sidewalks.

A large number of candidates took the initiative to gather their belongings when the elections ended and we appreciate it. But others seem to have forgotten that good ol' kindergarten rule — clean up after yourself.

It doesn't really matter whether you won; the posters and fliers have done their duty. Retire them to the recycling bin of your choice, and get rid of a senseless campus eyesore.

Thanks.

Enrolling Get the facts and get a good adviser

It's pre-enrollment season once again, and thousands of students are standing in the Willard Hall lines to pre-enroll.

For many, the hell has just begun, because later in the semester, they'll discover they really don't need particular classes they are taking.

Going to advising sessions can help students avoid such a surprise.

Of course, students should always double-check their classes with the curriculum guide, and if uncertainty still lingers, they should get a second opinion.

It's not too difficult to ask another professor's opinion or even change advisers.

After finding a trustworthy adviser, ask permission to be placed on that person's advising list. Then change it with your department's office.

This sends the word to all advisers to brush up on what they need to know. It's not fair to make students rely on someone who is ignorant to recent changes in the curriculum and requirements.

A good advisee-adviser relationship is important. Don't just run in and get that purple paper signed. Ask questions. Find out what you really need to know.

Getting all the facts could save you a semester's worth of tuition and make your college experience much more enjoyable.

Duke Empty threats may mean empty wallets

David Duke has based his campaign on the need to reform and eliminate "expensive" welfare and affirmative-action programs.

If elected, there's no doubt he will. Unfortunately, he's also going to have to eliminate other programs: things like highways, law enforcement and pretty much every other government service.

Louisiana relies on tourism to provide a large chunk of its operating budget. The money from conventions and Super Bowls is crucial to the programs used by the state's citizens each and every day.

But should Duke be elected, that money is gone. Various groups throughout the country have promised to hold their events — both those scheduled and those in the planning stages — elsewhere.

And despite Duke's claim that these are "empty threats" and that his election will not affect Louisiana's tourist industry, past events prove him wrong.

The state of Arizona has seen both college bowl games and a Super Bowl scheduled elsewhere because of its refusal to celebrate Martin Luther King Day. That means hundreds of millions of dollars have been lost.

It's a basic truth of American politics that voters base their decisions on the condition of their wallets.

It's also a basic truth that a vote for Duke means those wallets will be thinner.

How I became

Grand Poo-bah No. 3

and other campaign secrets

SHAWN BRUCE

The chant of "We're No. 3. We're No. 3." was still ringing in my ears as I began making my way out of the Bruce campaign headquarters (Ed Skoog's house).

As I paused to say goodbye to my supporters (three people who had come over to see Ed about money he owed them), tears came to my eyes.

It had been a dark journey down an ungraded country road — my campaign to become the next student body president of K-State. Now, with it drawing to a close, my mind wandered back to the precious memories I'll carry with me always.

I'll never forget the day I filed to be a candidate. On my way back to the Collegian after turning in my paperwork, I happened upon an official from the Student Life office.

Although he was encouraging, I couldn't help noticing he couldn't take his eyes off of my feet. It was almost as if he had never seen anyone wearing $3 Wal-Mart thongs on campus before.

Actually, that sense of amazement at my choice of footwear haunted me throughout the campaign. I would present my ideas for a kinder, gentler K-State to people and be rewarded with looks that said, "But you're wearing thongs."

The lesson learned? Next time I run for office, I might invest in some footwear that completely covers my feet. People seem to feel it's important. And sanitary.

I was also hurt by my late start, especially at the debate. While most of the other candidates had plenty of time to come up with these fantastic speeches about how much they loved K-State, my lack of preparation forced me to focus on the issues.

And yet, there were good times. The sing-alongs with the other candidates at cocoa night. The touching way Fred Wingert and Roy Cessna harmonized on "The Wind Beneath My Wings." The way Jackie McClaskey quickly drank glass after glass of hot chocolate.

OK, so there were no sing-alongs or cocoa nights. But I had to put something in to live in this column up a little bit. To be completely honest, the campaign trail was a little boring.

All of the candidates had essentially the same message. They all fell into the trap of "I like K-State, and I'm qualified to be president because I was the Grand Poo-bah of my sixth-grade class."

I tried to avoid most of these traps. I didn't put up posters. I didn't make sweatshirts. I didn't take myself completely seriously. I didn't wear shoes.

And almost 600 people voted for me. Though I'm not sure why, I think it had something to do with the fact that I seemed real to them. Either that or they fell for my campaign slogan: "Vote for the big, goofy guy."

In the end, I guess I feel as satisfied as a person who finished third ever has because, to be completely honest, I feel I made a difference.

I hope Jackie or Fred (as I write this, the outcome is still in doubt) realizes substance is still more important than style. I'll give them both the benefit of the doubt for now, but I'll be watching closely.

Especially if they're wearing shoes.

Reunification — the future for Korea?

Student hopes to bring countries, families together

JEONG-HEE KIM GUEST

Jeong-hee Kim is a graduate student in adult, occupational, continuing education.

Korea and the careful steps toward reunification have preoccupied my mind lately.

Vivid memories of a tear-provoking scene of people dancing on top of the crumbling Berlin Wall about two years ago still remain with me. I wonder if and when a similar historical turning point will come for Korea. I was deeply impressed with the peaceful movement, but I cannot stop thinking of the many effects of reunification on the economic balance, educational system, political agreement of running one country, and harmony of the two people's way of living.

I was not ready to internalize the unification of Germany because of my country's present situation. The steps and efforts toward reunification are still hard for me to believe. Two months ago, I needed to write an envelope to Germany instead of West Germany when I wrote a letter to my friend who studies there. My mental unreadiness may reflect my feelings about our country and our effort toward possible reunification.

Korea is smaller than California and located in the Far East between Japan and China. Throughout Korea's 4,325 years of history, we have had more than 500 wars, but nevertheless, remained united. Then we were under Japan's colonial rule for several decades. Not long after becoming independent from Japan, we suffered another war that cut Korea into two pieces.

The Korean War broke out June 25, 1950, and continued until 1953 when North and South declared an armistice. In the Korean War, U.S. Army troops helped the South, and the Soviet Union supported the North. So, Korea was divided by the 38th parallel, a neutral zone, the DMZ (Demilitarized Zone), the heavily fortified dividing line, which emphasized the separation similar to Germany's Berlin Wall. The 4-km-long electric wires and army troops on both sides of Korea deepened the wounds and mutual hostility.

Still now, American soldiers deploy to my country to fulfill their duties as soldiers. Last spring, an American soldier who was my classmate deployed to Seoul, causing a one-year separation from his family.

The trademark of South Korea on merchandise is Republic of Korea, and economic booms allowed South Korea to export almost everywhere in the world except North Korea. We, as civilians, visit almost everywhere in the world but North Korea. We are not allowed to share material abundance with people from the North. North Korea has beautiful scenery, such as the Kum Kang Mountain and Bak Du Mountain. North Koreans are not allowed to share with the South the beautiful sceneries and abundant natural resources such as mines, either.

About 10 million families were forced to separate from each other as a result of this political division. It is sad to watch my grandparents long for a moment when they can be reunited with their sons, separated from them 40 years ago.

It is exciting for me to think of cutting electric wires and going to visit relatives I have never personally met just as others are now doing in Germany. It will be a wonderful and relaxing experience to hike in the North mountains and learn more of our land that we were not allowed to explore.

If there is one Korea instead of North and South, there will be no divided country in this world.

One day, like the men and women who chipped away at Germany's Berlin Wall, we Koreans hope to cut the electric wires of the DMZ. Then the last of the divided countries in the world will be gone.

If the Berlin Wall and wires can be cut down through people's efforts, a similar turning point can happen on the other side of the Earth. With careful preparation, ears to listen to each other and willingness to give and sacrifice, we will make another joyful historical moment again. I hope the day will come soon.

LETTER

English essential to U.S. unity

Editor,

It was nice to see your editorial printed in six foreign languages Oct. 31. This spirit will help create an awareness of learning foreign languages among your readers. There is no question U.S. students lag behind other developed countries of the world in foreign language skills. The nation, whether we realize it or not, is paying a definite price for insensitivity to other languages. However, when your opinion deals with some fundamental questions that could affect the very integrity of the nation, the issue must be debated and an answer found.

I congratulate U.S. English for its timely and visionary program to make English the official language of the United States. The cause is a good one and in the nation's best interest.

I have first-hand experience with divisiveness, bloodshed and many miseries people are subjected to when there is more than one major language in a country.

Bangladesh was separated from Pakistan partly because of two predominant languages in the same country. India, Pakistan and many African and East European countries routinely experience turmoil and havoc caused by linguistic differences and barriers. Our next door neighbor to the north is another example.

Our non-English speaking predecessors had the foresight to keep the integrity of the country. They gave up their mother tongues to adopt English as the new first language for their children. English definitely acted as a glue that cemented the nation together. English is not my mother tongue, but when I chose the United States to be my homeland, I was willing and ready to replace Bengali with English as the first language for my children.

It is time for us to realize that we live in a "global village" and regional economic integration will play a major role in our national well being.

Knowing foreign languages is becoming more and more important than ever before. If we want to keep the United States in one piece, English must be legislated into being the official language. We cannot afford not to do so at a time when our population is increasingly becoming multicultural and multilingual.

A message

From K-State-Salina
Merging schools doesn't merge ideals

LISA SNEATH GUEST

Lisa Sneath is a sophomore in computer engineering.

I am a K-State student at the Salina campus. I don't know how many of the Manhattan students know we exist over here, or if they even care. But on the chance that I might open a few eyes, I want to express a few opinions.

When the merger went through, there were mixed feelings of happiness and anger. Many thought it was more of a takeover than a merger; and many felt pride in becoming part of K-State. And some of us felt both ways.

I think the biggest problem is that we are afraid of losing our identity. We fear we will lose our independence and uniqueness only to fall under a ton of paperwork and bureaucracy.

We have a small population, and we are used to doing things our own way. We don't like "big brother" telling us we have channels to go through. I know that when you are dealing with more than 20,000 students, you handle things differently than with less than 800 students. Around here, if you want to do something, you just do it with a verbal OK — forms and meetings are only for the records.

Instructors and staff know students by their first names. They know where to find us or who to talk to if they need to see a student for some reason. If we have problems in classes, I don't know one instructor who isn't willing to spend an hour or two to help. If you have a problem with your financial aid, you talk to Amy. If you need transcripts, you talk to Denise. The point is it's like going to a small high school. But if you never did, I can't explain it to you in this short letter.

The sad part is that we are fighting changes, which have to be made if we are to become what we want to be. I guess we always dream of bigger and better; but is bigger always better?

Yes, bigger means more security for the school's future. Yes, bigger means more recognition for our graduates. And, yes, bigger means miles of red tape to get anything done. And, yes, bigger means we will lose the one-on-one contact with the faculty and staff.

I am trying not to sound too negative, because I believe we at the Salina campus have a chance to enjoy the benefits of both worlds. We can enjoy the K-State name without getting lost in the crowd. As far as I know, there has never been a rape, a racial fight or even any real problem with theft on this campus. I can leave my purse on the sink in the ladies room without worrying that it will disappear. We don't have campus police and, up until this year, it was rare to even get a parking ticket. (But that's a story all its own.)

In the last several months, people around here have been hearing "We can't do it that way. We are K-State now, and we have to uphold the K-State image."

Another thing that disappointed several others and myself is learning that the Salina campus would no longer have a paper of its own. True, it wasn't much when it did make an issue, but at least it was about us.

I thought there would be nothing in the Manhattan issue that would be of interest to me — until the other day when I was looking through the Oct. 18 Collegian. I found it quite interesting to see four men (I think) named in a college publication. I was surprised that it was allowed by faculty and dismayed that some responsible student didn't speak up and say "Do you think this is really in good taste?"

I understand the point you were trying to make: this band is quite obviously very different. I myself got a kick out of the picture and tried to get some of the students here to do our own version. But there was talk of hiding behind floppy discs and hard drives, and it soon just became a joke.

So much for upholding the K-State image.

Schools combine programs

K-State, Manhattan Christian College work together to offer dual-degree opportunity

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Most K-State students receive one degree after four or five years. Some students, however, simultaneously complete another degree from Manhattan Christian College.

A dual-degree program between K-State and its across-the-street neighbor has been an option for students for about 21 years.

MCC Vice President John Poulson said students can participate in this program if they are willing to go to school for five years and able to take courses from both institutions.

He said students cannot enroll full time at both institutions. A student may be a full-time MCC student and a part-time K-State student for one semester, then reverse the load the next semester.

Freshmen in the program can only take MCC courses.

"But during the freshman year, a total of 15 hours at MCC is credited toward the K-State degree," Poulson said. "And you never even cross the street."

Sophomores and juniors coordinate their classes between the two schools. The last two years of study are done at K-State, where specialized courses are taken for particular majors.

Poulson said 31 percent of MCC students are taking advantage of this program.

But he said the number is actually higher because MCC freshmen do not declare their majors until the end of their first year, which leaves them out of that number.

Willard Nelson, associate director of the Center for Student and Professional Services in the College of Education, said the total number of K-State students in the program is not known, but about 20 education students participate.

Education is one of the colleges that sponsors the joint program.

The colleges of Human Ecology, Arts and Sciences, Business Administration and Agriculture all offer dual-degree programs.

"However, if students want to get a dual degree from a certain K-State college that doesn't offer it, the college will usually work with the student so it can be accomplished," Poulson said.

Manhattan Christian College

■ Manhattan Christian College and K-State have cooperated in providing dual degree programs for students for the past 21 years.

■ Students do not have to be in a dual degree program to take classes at the other college.

Students pay full tuition at the school in which they are enrolled full time. At the other school, they pay by the credit hour.

"By having this dual-degree program, our enrollment has definitely gone up," Poulson said. "This is one of the main reasons students decide to come to MCC."

Diane Salsbery, senior in social work, has been in the dual-degree program since her freshman year.

"The reason I am in the program is because I want to get a good education that has a Christian background," she said.

Poulson said the program benefits students who want to be missionaries.

Many of them discover it is hard to find mission work without a specific degree.

Education students also find the program helpful because they can go to college in a Christian atmosphere and still be certified to teach in a public school.

"This program allows students to enjoy both K-State and MCC," Nelson said. "Also, the program works in favor of both institutions."

Poulson said there are a few disadvantages for some students.

Five years may be too long for some students to go to school, and it might cause a financial burden, especially for out-of-state students.

Organizing a class schedule that does not conflict can also be difficult.

Nelson said this program has come a long way in 21 years. He said it has expanded many students' career options.

Students do not necessarily have to be in the dual-degree program to use the other college.

Poulson said MCC students take math and natural science courses at K-State because they are not available at MCC, while some K-State students take MCC courses as general electives.

Enough of the Irish

Last Saturday, I lived the dream of many fellow sports fans.

No, I didn't get to bat against Dennis Leonard at the Royals' Hall of Famers Fantasy Dream Week. But I did get to nestle up in front of the tube on a cold day to watch college football.

I had the overwhelming good fortune of watching Notre Dame on NBC.

OK, so my remote control had a dead battery.

That can't detract from the perseverance I showed from simply leaving the television tuned into the home of the peacock. I did expend the energy to set the television on mute, though.

So you wonder what made the day so special, seeing as how the Fightin' Irish will be on NBC every weekend until, well ...

I keep telling myself the alliance between Notre Dame and NBC is just a bad dream. How could the jealous NCAA stand back and let this happen?

But that nightmare came to life right before my eyes on my 20-inch screen. As expected, NBC was televising the Irish. Sickening enough to stop there, right?

Well, they went farther, calling their program "Notre Dame Saturday."

Notre Dame's broadcasting network couldn't have covered the game with stronger bias. Every flashback or highlight glorified the Irish. Nothing was said about their opponent, Tennessee.

Even Ted Turner isn't that cheezy.

As if trying to draw national support to Notre Dame behind the symbol Catholicism isn't enough. Nothing against Catholics, but it isn't reason to run off and support the Irish.

Good idea — why not have K-State try to increase support by adopting a stance on an important public issue? Abortion, for example. How about the Kansas State Anti-Abortionists? That doesn't have much of a ring to it, but it might win over some fans (and funds) that might not otherwise make their way to K-State.

It has always been fun to watch Notre Dame in order to cheer against Notre Dame. There is even more reason now, thanks to NBC. It wasn't too long ago I heard Lou Holtz tell Colorado to watch out in the Orange Bowl, because K-State wouldn't be their opponent. It's nice when the Protestants and other sinners can knock off the big boys.

I lost interest, though, as Notre Dame ran out to a 34-14 lead. I will confess something. I didn't mute the television so I wouldn't have to listen to the poor analysis. I did it in order to hear Mitch Holthus' call of K-State's big 37-7 win over Iowa State.

With the Cats victorious and the Hawks losing big, I was excited to discover the Iowa-Indiana game on ABC. The coverage was, as expected, quite equal. But that was all that was well-balanced as the Hawkeyes, K-State's football parents, were all over Indiana. They jumped to a 21-0 first-quarter lead and coasted to a win.

With that outcome decided and an afternoon nap calling me, I was more than satisfied. And then a pleasing fourth quarter score rolled across: Tennessee 35, Notre Dame 34. Eagerly, I switched back, and, sure enough, the Fightin' Irish were down by one late in the game.

I watched them march down the field for a game-winning field goal. A typical Notre Dame-comeback win. But NBC's hearts were broken as the field goal fell short of the mark, probably ending their national title hopes.

I'm not normally one to rub in a loss, but...

Notre Dame (and NBC) lost! Meanwhile, the team Holtz enjoyed attacking didn't. K-State won.

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

The volleyball team's lone senior, Rhonda Hughes, will play her final home game Saturday against the Missouri Tigers. Hughes was selected to the first team Academic all-Big Eight squad for the second straight year Tuesday. She was one of four Cats who were honored.

Hughes faces final match

Lone senior to play in Ahearn for last time against Missouri

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

The procedure won't change from the last four years.

She will come to the gym about 45 minutes before warm-up starts, go to her locker, put on her uniform and get her ankles taped. Then she will pray.

And yet, it will not be the same.

When Rhonda Hughes prepares for Saturday's volleyball match against the Missouri Tigers, she will do it for the last time in familiar surroundings. It is the last home game she will play for the Wildcats.

"I think it will be weird," Hughes said. "At the beginning of the season, I hadn't thought about it, but now, it is my last game and it's starting to hit me."

After the season finale next week at Colorado, Hughes' career will be a compilation of memories.

"I'll miss a lot of people," Hughes said. "I'll remember all the good friendships with the girls on the team and the good times we had."

It's not only the team Hughes will miss. It's the competition of the Big Eight Conference.

While she hasn't set any school or conference records in her career, Hughes has still posted some impressive numbers.

With 333 digs in her sophomore season and an average of 3.54 per game, Hughes was the top digger in the league. The performance ranked fifth on K-State's single-season chart.

Such marks have resulted in Hughes' reputation as a solid defensive player.

"Her biggest attribute is her defensive play," K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "Rhonda works extremely hard and is very quick on the court."

Hughes said her attitude helped her have a successful college career.

"I think I am pretty aggressive," she said. "I am very mentally tough. I mean, I rarely go out of the match mentally losing."

But her biggest plus is that she likes competition.

"She is dedicated to the program and she is a very competitive person," Hagemeyer said. "That makes her a very good athlete. I'm really happy with her commitment. She wants to make sure that K-State volleyball was a good experience. By making the attempt to play the best she can, she can walk away with a good feeling about the last year."

The encore season has left a bittersweet taste in Hughes' mouth. She said she learned a lot from Hagemeyer, but has missed out on her primary goal.

"I was disappointed in that I couldn't go to the Big Eight Tournament in my fourth year," Hughes said. "Everybody has a second chance next year, but I don't. I'm done. It was the last chance for me. And that bothers me."

Honors weren't totally fleeting, however, as Hughes attained her second goal — to be selected to the Academic all-Big Eight first team. She became the fourth K-State player to be named to the team for three seasons.

Hughes' contributions have been elevated in a season of change. After Betsy Berkley quit the team early in the season, Hughes was the lone remaining senior and has been called on to lead a young team.

"I was a silent leader," Hughes said. "I never have been the cheerleader type, but I always led by example. I've got people telling me, 'You look like a leader just because of the way you are acting.'"

Hughes said the seed for her leadership role was planted during her freshman year.

"My first year was very interesting," Hughes said. "It was a kind of a transition period from high school to college. It was exciting. It was the year Shawnee Call and Val Kastens, who were stars to me, played. I had a Pair of factors takes toll on stats

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

The past few weeks, Missouri football coach Bob Stull and his defensive unit must be feeling like a scud bunker.

What the Tigers have yielded this season has people wondering if the defense has shown up:

- 490.3 yards of total offense per game
- 169.1 yards passing
- 321.2 yards rushing
- 35.3 points per contest

The numbers have given Stull and his coaching staff plenty of sleepless nights and all-day headaches.

"I just don't know how to explain it," Stull said. "We've tried to put people out there to get the job done. They're just getting beat."

What most people don't realize, however, is that Missouri has played one of the toughest schedules in the country. Teams such as Illinois, Baylor, Indiana, Colorado, Oklahoma and Nebraska are equally responsible for the nasty numbers.

"We've had some of the toughest teams that anybody should face," Stull said. "And when you face some of the teams that we've faced, of course things are going to get tough."

Hanging tough is what Stull is hoping his defense can do against K-State this weekend.

"They've got the kind of offense that can hit you from anywhere," Stull said. "But we're hoping we can patch things together so we can stay with them."

The reason for the patchwork comment is simple. Stull's program has been riddled with injuries all season. Only eight players on the team have played in all nine games.

"I don't know any coach in America that wouldn't make praise about being free of injuries," Snyder said. "I know that this has not put Missouri into a non-win situation. They still have a lot of talent left on the sidelines."

One of those players who has avoided injury so far and who worries Snyder is quarterback Phil Johnson.

To this point, Johnson has racked up 2,108 yards of total offense — 1,931 passing and 177 rushing.

"He does a lot of things like Darian would do," Snyder said in reference of Colorado quarterback Darian Hagan.

Stull was quick to side with Snyder on the assessment of his sophomore quarterback.

"One of the things that he needs to learn to do is stay in the pocket more often," Stull said. "If we can get him to relax and just let his talent take over, then we should be able to play a good game."

Duke starts at the top

Krzyzewski says
Blue Devils don't want comparisons

By the Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. — Duke will start the college basketball season where it left off — on top of the heap — but Coach Mike Krzyzewski wants the similarities to end there.

The Blue Devils, who won the NCAA title last March in their fourth consecutive Final Four appearance and fifth in six years, were the clear-cut No. 1 choice in the Associated Press preseason poll released Wednesday.

"We've never brought last year into the next year before," Krzyzewski said. "There is no reason to do that this year. The word 'defending' absolutely is not a part of our vocabulary. We've won that championship, it's ours, that's it. That year's over."

Duke received 49 of 65 first-place votes and 1,606 points from a nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters to easily outdistance Indiana, which had 11 first-place votes and 1,533 points.

"I have to deal with reality, not with predictions," he said. "The biggest obstacle for us right now is in how we're preparing is focus."

"My expectations have been high every year. I don't see any reason not to have them this year," Krzyzewski added. "I don't base my expectations on anybody else's expectations. If they are the same as other people, then that's great. If we don't meet up to them, I'll be disappointed. It won't be relevant if anybody else is disappointed."

Duke now has the longest consecutive streak of being ranked, having been in every poll since the first week of the 1986-87 season. Arizona has the second-longest streak, starting in the preseason poll of 1987-88.

The opening poll of the season was top-heavy with teams from the power conferences — ACC, Big Ten, SEC and Big East — and lighter without perennial staples UNLV and Syracuse.

Arkansas, with three first-place votes and 1,390 points, was third, the first of three teams from the Southeastern Conference in spots 3-6. Kentucky, which is eligible for the NCAA tournament after serving a two-year ban for violations under Eddie Sutton, was fourth with 1,278 points, two more than Arizona, the Pac-10 invader which broke up the SEC inside straight.

Louisiana State, which will feature 7-foot-2 junior Shaquille O'Neal, had one first-place vote and 1,171 points for sixth and the Tigers were followed by Ohio State, 1,158; North Carolina, 1,135; Seton Hall, 1,096; and St. John's, 1,077.

Seton Hall was the only other team to receive a first-place vote, with one.

UNLV, which lost all five starters, isn't in the rankings for the first time since the preseason poll of the 1987-88 season.

Newcomers help
Bietau's outlook for spring season

BILL LANG
Contributing Sports Writer

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau got a good look at the future of his tennis program this fall.

It's a view he likes.

Freshman Karin Lusnic was one of the bright spots, as she finished the fall with a 15-4 record. She captured the Nebraska Invitational title in September and managed to win seven matches at the Riviera All-America Tennis Tournament, which included the top 32 players in the country. The highlights earned Lusnic a No. 3 seed at last week's Rolex Central Region Championships in Omaha, Neb.

"She's got a great work ethic and a determination to do better," Bietau said. "Right now, I would have to say after this fall, that she has got to be one of the top 25 players in the country."

Bietau said the play of Lusnic and fellow freshman Mareke Plocher has given the program a huge boost.

Another player who played well this fall, Bietau said, was Riniker, a sophomore.

"She's been playing some of her best tennis in her career this fall," Bietau said. "She's gotten a lot of her mechanics straightened out and is looking really good."

Despite the standout performances, Bietau said he is not ready to predict where the Wildcats will finish in the Big Eight Tournament. But he said, "I will be disappointed if we're not in the upper division."

"Kansas, Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and we will have a little dog-fight to see who's going to finish in the top four spots," Bietau said. "Every one of those teams has a lot of talent returning, and they'll be getting some more talent in January."

"Kansas is one of the most improved programs in the country at this point. Oklahoma State is down just a bit from last year, but not by much. And Oklahoma has virtually everybody returning from last year's squad."

One of the main things that concerns Bietau is the status of Angie Gover. Gover suffered a shoulder injury during the past summer and has been undergoing an extensive rehabilitation.

"We just don't know how it's going to handle to a full day of tennis until late January," Bietau said.

Kansas rates high among states in education poll

Adult population ranks high among high school educated

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Kansas ranks among the top one-fourth of the states in the portion of its adult population that completed high school, the Census Bureau reported Wednesday.

The report, based on a survey of 58,000 households nationwide in 1989, estimated 82.2 percent of the state's population age 25 and older had completed four years of high school.

The survey found 22.3 percent of Kansas' over-25 population had completed at least four years of college.

Kansas fared better than the national average. The survey estimated 76.9 percent of people older than 25 nationally have completed high school and 21.1 percent finished four years of college.

Using the agency's "midpoint estimate," only 11 states exceeded Kansas in the percentage of their 25-and-over population that completed high school. Two states, New Hampshire and Nebraska, were ranked the same as Kansas.

The 11 states were Utah, Washington, Alaska, Wyoming, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, Montana, Iowa, Colorado and Hawaii.

Among Kansas' neighbors, the survey estimated 75.9 percent of Missouri's 25-and-over population had completed high school: 75.4 percent in Oklahoma, 67.6 percent in Arkansas, 83.2 percent in Colorado and 83.4 percent in Iowa.

The Census Bureau cautioned some differences in the rankings were statistically insignificant because the results were based on a survey and the percentages were valid within a range of sampling error.

For example, the percentage of Kansas 25 and over who have completed high school, is between 80.1 percent and 84.3 percent.

New Hampshire had a range of 79.9 percent to 84.5 percent. Nebraska had a range of 80.2 percent to 84.2 percent.

Pi Kaps promote awareness

PUSH raises money for handicapped, teaches understanding

Pi Kappa Phi was the first fraternity to create a non-profit organization as its philanthropy.

This non-profit organization, People Understanding the Severely Handicapped, is operated solely by the Pi Kaps.

PUSH was also the first philanthropy to raise and donate more than $1 million. Yearly contributions are now reaching more than $100,000.

K-State's Pi Kaps have been involved in this program since 1977.

"Hopefully, we are leading the other fraternities as an example," said John Owen, freshman in secondary education and chairman of the fraternity's philanthropy committee.

Money raised by the Pi Kaps goes toward buying play units and special equipment for the disabled. Money is also donated to schools with handicapped students. The fraternity pays for all equipment and helps with construction.

"I have seen a kid who was paralyzed from the neck down," Owen said.

"We were able to purchase a type of computer to put into his mouth."

Contributions also support a traveling puppet show that helps children and adults understand what being handicapped really means. These skits are usually 15 to 20 minutes long.

Another national fund-raiser is PUSH America, in which members of the fraternity bicycle across the United States to raise money for the severely handicapped.

Window-wash activities — fraternity members washing windshields — are also done around the nation.

"When people see that we are trying to help a good cause, they are usually glad to help with contributions," Robert Ohmes, senior in chemical engineering, said.

Pi Kaps not only participate in all the national fund-raisers, but have also contributed their time and support around the community as well.

They served as supporters, cheerleaders, huggers, scorekeepers and award givers for a handicapped bowling tournament Oct. 19 in Salina.

"When it comes to philanthropies, it is easy to talk about money and fund-raisers," Neil Neaderhiser, senior in mechanical engineering technology, said. "But there is a lot better understanding when you actually see and work with the people involved. The house takes pride in what they are doing."

Owen said he believes working with the handicapped is an excellent cause. "People are raised around the myths of the handicapped," he said. "People tend to be scared of them or think they are harmful. They will also tend to shove them into a corner. However, the handicapped have a lot to offer.

"Hopefully, our house will promote the handicapped throughout the community. They will gain the knowledge and understanding of the handicapped."

Owen said their ultimate goal is to be the host of a basketball tournament for the handicapped at K-State.

"This is my long-term dream," Owen said. "However, there might be possibilities of pulling one off in late February or early March. This would definitely become an annual event, which would get the community involved."

Students tour prisons; educational experience

Lansing, Leavenworth trip gives class opportunity to view prison life first hand

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Fifteen students were excused from class Wednesday to become exposed to a totally different culture than Manhattan.

The corrections class, which is a criminal justice class, toured the Lansing Correctional Facility and the United States Penitentiary in Leavenworth.

Lansing is a state prison that houses between 1200 to 1300 inmates in minimum, medium and maximum security.

Leavenworth Penitentiary houses approximately 1600 inmates that have committed federal crimes. The same type of security is used.

The amount of security needed for an inmate depends on how well they adjust to the prison system, their disciplinary actions and their mental stability.

"I thought I would see inmates just sitting in their cells under strict order," said Anthony Banton, sophomore in business administration. "They have more freedom than I would expect them to have."

Education and job opportunities exist for the inmates. Most inmates take courses to earn their General Education Diploma or college degree.

They can also learn a vocational skill or trade.

The furniture, textiles, clothes and other products that are constructed by the inmates are sold to the state governments and agencies.

Inmates receive a small wage for their contribution. Depending on their situation, inmates pay back some of their wages to the court.

In the Leavenworth Penitentiary, every inmate that is physically able to work must do so.

They have a federal prison industry program called Unicorn. The program is similar to a factory assembly line.

Students were able to see the artistic ability of some inmates by looking at their paintings and drawings.

After touring the Lansing facility, students had the opportunity to eat a lunch served by the inmates.

Karen Baird-Olson, instructor in social anthropology and social work, said she feels the field trip gave students an opportunity to see how the actual theories about corrections are used in practice.

"They say a picture is worth a thousand words but I feel this trip to the prison can be worth a thousand textbooks," Baird-Olson said.

stopped far short of announcing a long-awaited administration package of food and other aid.

tion, Bush said: "Your country is counting on you to find new uses for traditional and non-traditional crops. We want you to outfox our competitors with your marketing skills."

But he quickly turned his attention to the Congress-bashing themes he has been using of late, telling his youthful audience: "I'm sure you can appreciate that a capital gains tax cut would improve property values."

He also accused Congress of stalling on his bill to ease federal restrictions on banks.

Bush only briefly touched on a subject of considerable interest in farm states: an aid package for the Soviet Union.

"We intend to help them in their economic transition," he said. But he

FDA may cut approval time

Drugs would be available to cancer, AIDS patients faster

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration said Wednesday it hoped to cut years off the approval process for most new drugs and give patients with diseases such as AIDS and cancer faster access to treatments.

The changes will have the potential to save millions of lives and billions of dollars, said Vice President Dan Quayle, chairman of the group that made the recommendations.

For the most important new therapies, the proposal could reduce the decision-making time from 30 months to six months.

"We are already moving mountains" in AIDS treatment, FDA Commissioner David Kessler said, noting that the anti-AIDS drug didanosine, or DDI, was approved in six months.

Quayle and Kessler joined Health and Human Services Secretary Louis Sullivan at a news conference to announce the plan.

"Wouldn't it be wonderful to have a cure for AIDS in the marketplace before Magic Johnson gets AIDS," Quayle said of the Los Angeles Lakers basketball star, who said last week that he has the virus that causes the disease.

Capital Hill Democrats expressed support for expediting approval of such drugs, but warned the plan could lower safety standards and give too much power to the drug industry because of its financial links to potential private reviewers.

The plan, based on recommendations from the Council on Competitiveness, calls for expanding the review process by using private medical staff under contract with FDA and blending the agency's review standards with those of other industrialized nations.

The FDA estimated that the reforms would reduce the time needed for approval of drugs for life-threatening

In Washington, Mitchell took a return swipe at Bush, telling reporters, "As the president's poll numbers go down, the White House gets more and more panicky."

Mitchell said Bush's efforts to blame others for what are obvious failures of his administration are actually very pathetic.

Bush's ratings in polls have been slumping dramatically in recent weeks, apparently reflecting American concerns about the faltering economy.

The president increasingly has been seeking to blame Democrats in Congress for the nation's economic woes.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN IN FOCUS

K-State ruggers Jim Turner and Ted Poppitz (ABOVE) search for goalpost holes on the snow-covered artillery parade field at Fort Riley. The rugby team has to construct the playing field each time the team plays because it lacks a permanent place to practice and compete. Greg Robke tapes back his ears (RIGHT) to keep them from being injured or ripped off during the game. No helmets or pads are used for protection.

A BATTLE Royale

K-STATE MEN'S RUGBY TEAM DEFIES ALL ELEMENTS

It wasn't quite the kind of day to be playing games. It was cold and windy and the ground was covered with snow. But then again rugby is played in more kinds of weather than the postal service carries mail in.

The players found the field practically frozen with a few patches of slush and the holes to put the goalposts in were frozen over.

After a few choice words, new holes were made and the posts were put into place. The field was marked off, and with snow and slush and other muck, this, too, turned into a difficult task with a few choice words being said.

All this work for two games lasting a little more than three hours. But this kind of work and play are what makes the K-State/Fort Riley Rugby Football Club one of the better teams in the Midwest.

"We put so much into our program," said assistant coach Mike Duncan. "We do everything from setting up the posts to cleaning up a little bit after the game. It develops a lot of the loyalty that we have on this team. If we didn't do the other stuff to support our program we probably wouldn't have the players staying with us as long as they do."

Some of those people had those feelings checked Saturday. K-State lined up against Kansas with high expectations and hopes of keeping their version of the "Governor's Cup" in Manhattan.

As the temperature started to melt some of the snow and thaw the field, KU was able to get a few advantageous calls from the official and win the first game 10-0.

"I'd rather lose by a ton of points and to any other team, instead of losing a close one to KU," said Brad Steinlage, senior in economics.

This is the nature of the game, though. Line up, take your knocks and deliver them. Lick your wounds and hope that the pain is gone by tomorrow so you can change the channel on the television.

"The thing about this game is that it all depends on us what we put into it," said Johnny Allen, sophomore in sociology. "We do put a lot of hard work into it and hope that we win. We hate to lose as much as anybody else. But if we lose and someone comes up to me after the game and says 'Hey, I'm glad this game is over. You hit harder than anybody I know,' then I feel I've had a good game. Plus, what other game do you know of where you can kick the shit out of somebody, then go drink beer with them."

But before the post-game activities could begin, K-State did deliver their licks in the second game.

In the second game, the "old-timers" and some of the members of the collegiate team got a chance to play.

The second game was comprised of members coming from Fort Riley and around Manhattan. K-State was able to put two scores on the board and got away with an 8-0 victory.

"We did a little bit better in that one," said KSU/FRFC coach Greg Barnes. "But we still needed to win the first one."

However, with the games over and the post-game formalities of shaking hands and congratulations going around the field, it was time for the third half.

"Some people don't know what to think of this part," Duncan said. "All we're doing is just what some people call male-bonding. In reality, it's just sportsmanship. We're just saluting the play of the opponents and getting better every time we talk about our game."

K-State and KU, still with a little animosity towards each other, eventually broke down and started to sing. It was a scene right out of an Irish pub where the folk songs seem to bellow from the rafters.

After the singing of the Rugby National Anthem — which would probably rile most American veterans if heard — the cup was handed over, with a lot of reluctance, to KU.

"Well, they played a great game," Steve Robke, senior in industrial engineering and K-State's team captain said while presenting the cup. "Now go drink your beer and leave us alone."

After a couple of hours of relaxing and rehashing the efforts made in the game it was once again time to go home and then wake up just hoping to turn the channel on the television the next morning.

A Kansas player sacks K-State fullback Ramon Fewell (ABOVE) during Saturday's annual Heart of America match-up. The K-State offense never hit full stride and lost 10-0. Post-game tradition calls for the host team to provide a common form of recreation (RIGHT), and Saturday night was no exception. The two teams consumed food and beverages and sang socially offensive songs at Study Hall in Aggieville.

Play explores mid-life crisis

'Any Day Wednesday,' a two-act drama written by grad student, making premiere

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

There's an exciting world premiere of a play planned for this weekend, but you won't have to travel to New York City to catch the show.

"Any Day Wednesday" is a two-act play written by a K-State student that is being produced for the first time in a full production.

Written by Stephanie Cox, graduate student in English, "Any Day Wednesday" chronicles the journey of a woman reaching middle age and searching for some answers and direction in her life.

For a time, at least, that journey leads her away from her home and family on a farm in western Kansas, and Wednesday starts to explore the big, wide world.

Cox worked for a few years before returning to the Department of English to work on a master's degree, but she is far from even an early mid-life crisis. She said finding the motivation and inspiration for the middle-aged Wednesday, however, was not as difficult as it may seem.

"I see it in a lot of women," she said of Wednesday's journey into the soul and the world.

The character, Cox said, took root in her imagination. She had been working on another project when the initial idea for this play first came to her.

"I literally sat up in the middle of the night and started writing," Cox said.

She had already had some playwriting experience under Norman Fedder, professor of speech, in the theater department as an undergraduate student, and the play "Any Day Wednesday" came to life in Fedder's workshop last fall.

"I knew what had to happen to the characters," she said. "I just got the work done during the workshop."

Cox said she praises Fedder and the direction he offers his playwrights through the workshop, as well as the support and encouragement she has received from the speech department on "Any Day Wednesday."

Kate Anderson, associate professor of speech, is directing the play. Cox said it is exciting to see Anderson and the actors at work.

"They have all been just wonderful," she said. "I have always been interested in theater, but never really explored it until I took Doc's (Fedder's) workshop as a senior."

Now, in her final year of a three-year master's program in creative writing, Cox is considering different avenues through which to pursue her interest in theater in the future, continuing her exploration of theater and writing for the stage.

Cox and other playwrights helped form the Playwrights' Stage in spring 1990 to offer student playwrights a forum for their works — many of which come out of Fedder's workshops.

Writing this play has been an interesting creative experience, she said, and the play — which is now a straight drama — started out as more of a comedy.

"It's strange to hear lines I originally put in simply because they were funny delivered now, because they aren't funny now," she said.

The play has been through a number of changes, Cox said, but many things have stayed the same throughout the many drafts.

"Wednesday's monologues," she said, "have stayed essentially the same. No matter how much has changed with the rest of the play, I always knew who Wednesday was."

"Any Day Wednesday" will be performed at 8 p.m. Nov. 14-16 and Nov. 20-23 in Nichols Theater. For ticket information call 532-6428.

diseases from 9.75 years to 5.5 years. And with faster approval, the council said, drug companies could save an average $60 million of the $231 million needed to develop a new drug.

"We want a significant amount of these earnings to be passed on to the consumer through lower prices," Quayle said.

But Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Reps. John Dingell, D-Mich., and Henry Waxman, D-Calif., told Kessler that by allowing private reviews and accepting foreign government approvals, the FDA appears to be abdication its responsibility to make key decisions on the safety of drugs.

They expressed support for expediting approval of drugs for AIDS and life-threatening diseases, but said the administration should seek greater resources for the FDA rather than attempting to supplant it with less credible alternatives.

The House Government Operations subcommittee on intergovernmental relations voted Wednesday to subpoena correspondence between the FDA and Quayle's council to determine how the council influenced the FDA's formation of the revamped drug approval process.

Sidney Wolfe, director of the Public Citizen Health Research Group, called the measures on privatizing and accepting foreign data "the biggest threat to the safety of prescription drug supply I have seen" in 20 years of monitoring the nation's health care.

Sullivan said changes in the review process "will in no way compromise our mandate to guarantee the safety and efficacy of drugs approved by this agency."

And Kessler said the American people expect a very high degree of safety, but that people are willing to take some more risks when it comes to a life-threatening disease for which there are no alternative treatments.

The FDA is already under pressure from Congress to loosen restrictions on drugs for diseases such as AIDS, Alzheimer's and cancer.

Rep. Tom Campbell, R-Calif., has introduced a bill that would allow individuals with such diseases to use experimental drugs.

lot of fun playing with them, and I learned a lot from them."

Some of those things undoubtedly will be taken into the future.

"I can't see myself without being in volleyball," Hughes said. "I love this sport so much I'll probably continue to play, maybe on USVA teams. I even can see myself as a coach. It's crossed my mind."

Still, there are two games left. Hughes, a Manhattan native whose dream was to wear the purple and white, has one wish for her final home game.

"I want to win," she said. "I'd like to play well in my last home game."

arrested for criminal trespassing," Scott Moss said. "They told us they had 12 undercover cops at the funeral looking for us."

A member of the Clark family said no restraining order was sought by the family, and the Riley, Pottawatomie, Jackson, Geary and Shawnee county court clerks' offices had no record of such an order being issued as of Sept. 19.

"I wasn't allowed to attend my fiancé's funeral, and it kind of upset me, to say the least," Anthony Moss said.

"I was not aware of a restraining order, though it's not such a bad idea," said John Ehmen, Julie Clark's father-in-law. "We preferred they not be there."

Clark's father, who lives in Phoenix, Ariz., could not be reached for comment.

Clark had been separated from her husband, Steven Clark, and was in the process of a divorce at the time of the fire. Steven Clark also could not be reached for comment.

K-State to get update on AIDS research

National expert to discuss advances with Lafene, local hospital personnel

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

K-State will have the rare opportunity to get a first-hand update about AIDS by a nationally recognized governmental representative Friday.

Sten Vermund, chief of epidemiology of the division of AIDS at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, will speak about "Recent Advances in HIV/AIDS Research" at 1:30 p.m. in the K-State Union Little Theatre.

Vermund's presentation will be an update on the changing trends and the actual extent to which HIV and AIDS are affecting the country and the rest of the world.

He will discuss new and promising therapeutic approaches, such as recently developed drugs and vaccine prospects. Another focus will be the AIDS/HIV research priorities set by the federal government.

Richard Beeman, adjunct professor of entomology, who is a long-time friend of Vermund's, said he is considered a national expert on AIDS. He said he had been quoted in a national magazine and in local newspapers as an AIDS expert.

Beeman said Vermund received his medical degree at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in the Bronx. It was in the Bronx that Vermund got direct experience with AIDS working at an AIDS clinic.

Vermund will give two other lectures in Manhattan.

He will speak to the staff of the Saint Mary and Memorial hospitals and at Lafene Student Health Center about recent advances in HIV/AIDS research and related topics at 7:30 a.m. Friday at the Saint Mary Hospital.

Vermund will also speak at 10:45 a.m. Sunday at the Unitarian-Universalist Fellowship of Manhattan. His topic there will be "AIDS in the 1990s."

Alberto Broce, professor of entomology, said Sigma Xi, a scientific research society on campus, and the Communicable Disease Committee are cosponsoring Vermund's visit to campus, along with the Department of Entomology.

The speech is part of the regular seminar series the entomology department sponsors.

Holiday card sale begins

Stefanie Harris, junior in elementary education, helps Brandon Porter, Akram Al-Ashtal and Loren Breckenridge paint Christmas cards Thursday afternoon in Jardine L. The students have created over 410 cards to be sold in the K-State Union to raise money for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Students can help contribute to the hungry and also make a child's day by buying a Christmas card.

The cards will be available between noon and 2 p.m. today at the K-State Union second-floor lobby.

Thirteen children ages 6 to 10 from Manhattan schools have been working on the Christmas cards every day for the past two weeks at K-State's Hoefflin Stone House child-care center.

"I am looking forward to selling them in the Union," Shawn McCahon, 10, said. "I have made somewhere between 40 and 60 cards."

The money received will go toward purchasing canned goods for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, an organization that helps the hungry in the community.

The children will go grocery shopping to pick out the items they would like to give.

"I am happy we are making the cards," Loren Breckenridge, 6, said. "We are going to the grocery store afterward to buy cans with the money."

The children also have implemented a canned good drive for the Flint Hills Breadbasket this week. This drive will continue throughout November.

"They have really worked hard on this project," Stefanie Harris, junior in elementary education, said. "The project has really brought the class closer together. They are excited about the project, because they know they

Water damages research office

University budget cuts limit response to repair facilities

Buckets and hanging plastic are keeping the Institute for Environmental Research at K-State from becoming severely damaged by rain and melting snow.

Flat roofs across campus are the main cause of leakage inside buildings. Melting snow is a big problem, because it has nowhere to go. Huge pools of water are being created on roofs with plugged-up drains.

"The rusty water created a huge stain in our new carpet which was just purchased last summer," associate director Elizabeth McCullough said.

"I called the janitor so he could clean the stain before it settled in. However, he called back and said, because of budget cuts, they no longer purchased the chemicals they use to clean these stains."

McCullough said she believes the University is so stressed about the budget it is losing more money than it's gaining. More money is going to end up being spent for fixing the University, she said, than it would be to purchase the proper equipment in the first place.

"There is simply not enough maintenance and custodial money to survive as a university," McCullough said.

Byron Jones, director of the institute, said he is unhappy with the budget.

"So far, we have been fortunate with only hundreds of dollars worth of damage having been done," Jones said. "It could have been thousands worth if I would not have been there to catch it before it got worse."

Jones and McCullough spent time tacking up plastics to drape across the area of the institute in Seaton Hall. They could not go home until the plastic was hung. Buckets have been placed throughout the rooms to catch the rusty water. Emptying these buckets causes not only a loss of time for Jones and McCullough but for custodians as well.

They cannot, however, keep all the Mission statement postponed

Student opposition halts amendments' proposed adoption

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

TOPEKA — The Council of Chief Academic Officers did not get Board of Regents approval Thursday on its mission statement amendments at the November meeting.

Instead, the board decided to postpone voting on COCAO's "Partnership for Quality" after its failure to pass the Student's Advisory Committee. SAC is made up of the student body presidents from each of the regent universities in Kansas.

The board will wait to make a decision on COCAO's statement after each regent has been able to thoroughly study the material, Chairman Jack Sampson said.

Robert Ratzlaff, COCAO chairman and vice president for academic affairs at Pittsburg State University, briefed the regents on the statement. The statement was a response to the board's own proposed mission statement, "From Aspiration to Achievement," authored by Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents.

While both the board's statement and COCAO called for qualified admissions, they didn't agree on the terms of funding upon its implementation. The board said it wants to request financing on performance-based criteria which would look into the school's preparation for incoming students, student retention rates, graduation rates and basic learning skills.

COCAO denounced the idea by saying there is no link between qualified admissions and enrollment levels. One concern of COCAO was the ability to increase levels of student performance levels as well as retention.

By tying performance-based criteria into consideration for funding, Ratzlaff said the system's universities wouldn't be able to achieve the quality and integrity for which they are striving. Instead, he said, universities will be too concerned with keeping students in school to strive for quality in their educational system.

"It (performance-based funding) is not fair to institutions that are urban, like WSU, which has more of a problem with retention," Ratzlaff said. "To tie funding to these items will be, in the long run, to reduce the quality. If you tie retention to significant funding, quality will go down because retention will be the priority of the university."

He said if performance-based funding were approved, an urban school like WSU would have to change its mission statement of serving an urban community.

Sara Scribner, SAC chairwoman and PSU student body president, said SAC endorses neither the board's nor COCAO's mission statements.

Scribner said SAC does not believe "Partnership in Quality" provides the incentive for change necessary to achieve all the system wants to in the next decade.

"Our first concern is that the 'Partnership in Quality' proposal has omitted all references to performance-based funding. It seems logical that universities should have to meet established criteria in order to receive a 'reward' of monetary increases," she said.

"Funding mechanisms based on anything other than performance lead

K-State student legal services limited

Campus law offices offer advice, avoid student-university conflicts

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

Student legal services vary from school to school across the country. While K-State has a legal office, its services are limited.

At the University of Minnesota, student legal services staff can help a student draw up a will, file divorce papers, sue a landlord or recover a bad check.

Diane Urban, K-State's one-person legal service, can look over a lease before it's signed, write letters to a landlord if he or she withholds part of a deposit without cause, or give other general legal advice.

In a recent survey done by the University of Nebraska, 27 universities responded regarding student legal services. Fifty percent of surveyed student legal services are composed of either one full- or one part-time attorney. K-State is one of them.

While the types of services vary, the types of legal dilemmas facing college students vary relatively little.

College students across the nation are turning to student legal services with landlord-tenant disputes, consumer problems and criminal problems.

Other universities offer more legal services to students. Its continued cost effectiveness makes student legal services a growing field, Mark Karon, staff attorney at the University of Minnesota said.

The prevailing idea behind the establishment of student legal services is justice, Karon said.

"Every person should have access to justice. But only one in seven can afford it," Karon said.

The cost effectiveness of student legal services, he said, makes access to justice affordable.

"It would cost students between two and three dollars a semester to upgrade legal services at K-State," Sally Rouston, assistant dean of student life said.

Shelley Stall, director of student legal services at the University of Nebraska, said NU is an example of growing student legal services. NU's services used to be much like K-State's but have expanded in the last few years.

"Any kind of legal service is valuable," Stall said. "But the best offer some kind of court representation."

Nebraska's survey also indicated that 20 of the universities surveyed offer some amount of court representation.

Queen Victoria's voice found

LONDON (AP) — A faint voice on a 103-year-old recording device may be the only record of Queen Victoria speaking, author Paul Tritton believes. "I think it's more likely to be her than not," Tritton said Wednesday.

Although the case is not proven, the Science Museum, where the wax-coated cylinder has been stored for more than 60 years, is putting on a special display, the Times of London reported.

Only nine of about 40 words are recognizable: "Greetings ... the answer must be ... I have never forgotten," the Times said.

Jackson returns to video screen

NEW YORK (AP) — Pop superstar Michael Jackson ended a two-year artistic silence in prime time Thursday with the debut of his newest music video.

"Black or White" premiered as an 11-minute Fox Broadcasting Co. special after Fox's hit animated sitcom, "The Simpsons."

The video, which is said to have cost $4 million to produce, heralds the arrival of "Dangerous," Jackson's first album in four years. Jackson last performed in public during an 18-month world tour that ended in 1989.

The video also debuted in 27 countries, with a total audience estimated at 500 million by director John Landis.

What did they see? Supposedly, "Black or White" tackles the theme of racial harmony, but its message is mighty tough to derive from the images Jackson and director John Landis put on the little screen.

In the prologue, the camera zooms down from the clouds and into a suburb, where "Home Alone" star Macaulay Culkin is in his room playing air guitar to loud, edgy, Van Halen-esque rock music.

Tritton discovered it while researching a book about Henry Edmunds, who supported the Graphophone, a recording device of the 1880s.

Edmunds was asked to show it to the queen in September 1888 and sent a friend, Sydney Morse, the Times said.

Morse said the queen made a recording and that "he was going to treasure that for the rest of his life," Tritton told Independent Television News.

The Morse family gave the cylinder to the Science Museum in 1929.

Charges dropped in NY abuse case

NEW YORK (AP) — Prosecutors dropped charges against a couple who chained their 15-year-old daughter to a radiator to keep her off the street and away from drugs.

Eliezer and Maria Marrero were arrested on imprisonment charges Sept. 13 after police found Linda Marrero shackled inside the family's apartment. The parents said their daughter had gone on repeated crack binges.

The girl had told authorities her parents chained her for her own good. She has since checked into a drug treatment center.

Buffalo buyers bid big bucks

CANTON, Kan. (AP) — Buffalo buyers traveled from as far away as Virginia to bid on some of the area's finest bison stock at the 14th annual buffalo auction at Maxwell Game Refuge.

Wednesday's event drew nearly 90 buyers and 117 bison from herds in Kansas and Nebraska.

"These Maxwell animals, this is a real good bloodline here," said Larry Butterfield, National Buffalo Association president and 14-year veteran of the buffalo trade. Butterfield was on hand to buy herd bulls for a Seattle-area buffalo rancher.

The buffalo came from the Maxwell game preserve and other wildlife and parks herds in Garden City and Kingman, as well as from Nebraska, said Marc Murrell, regional wildlife information representative for the agency.

Last year, the sale raised $70,000 to $80,000, Murrell said.

The buffalo brought prices ranging from a few hundred dollars for calves up to several thousand dollars for bulls.

Dozens of spectators, perched on bleachers made of hay bales stacked on flatbed trailers, watched as buffalo calves, cows and bulls were herded into the auction ring by Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks rangers.

Cliff Peterson, one of the officials supervising the sale, said the Maxwell bison herd is reduced annually from about 230 animals to 160. The powerfully built buffalo roam free on about 2,250 acres of rolling land on the game preserve in northeast McPherson County.

"They're usually pretty laid-back," Peterson said of the buffalo. "But they can get pretty nasty when they're confined."

Senate approves full agenda

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week receives endowment of $20,000

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

Every Student Senate resolution and bill brought up for a vote was passed in a short meeting Thursday night.

SENATE

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week received an endowment of $20,000. This money enables organizers to make better preparations in soliciting speakers and coordinating other events.

"We have given endowments to two other groups (the Agriculture Judging and Debate teams)," Arts and Sciences Sen. Tricia Thornton said.

"It gives consistency to the program. They can plan ahead and even save money."

Some senators expressed concern that future Racial/Ethnic Harmony Weeks will not be successful and the endowment would be wasted. However, the bill provides for a review every three years to ensure proper use of the money.

Engineering Sen. Neil Neaderhiser said, "I'm not against this week, but the other two groups that have endowments are very old, have been around and are established. In the future of the Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, complacency could set in. We still need to look at it every year."

Another bill allocated $60,000 for an endowment for the agriculture judging team with the understanding that the teams would not request additional funding.

"I didn't expect to give them their cake and eat it too. It's like trying to put a Band-Aid on a stab wound."

Derek Nelson

Business Sen. Derek Nelson originally sponsored the bill but later withdrew his name.

"I didn't expect to give them their cake and eat it too. It's like trying to put a Band-Aid on a stab wound. It's like a tourniquet around our necks," Nelson said.

Graduate Sen. Joel Gruenke said, "This provides a way to find if endowments need to be increased, and it eliminates a loophole of making groups go try to get special allocations every year."

In other business, Senate unanimously recommended to Faculty Senate that an academic minors program be implemented.

Senators also voted to name David Awbrey, Wichita Eagle columnist and KU fan, an honorary Wildcat for giving K-State attention and praise.

"We'll welcome him into our little circle of friends throughout the state," Neaderhiser said.

Special allocations were also granted to Student Governing Association, the Pridettes, the Rowing Association and Asian Students for Intercultural Awareness.

Rights Committee studies diversity in working world

Workers must now support, help each other, Boyer says

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

The University Human Rights Campaign Committee is trying to sensitize the campus to diversity issues.

The committee, appointed by President Jon Wefald in the spring of 1990, has been developing activities to encourage diversity.

This semester, the campaign has focused on classified employees. Four awareness sessions have been conducted at various times over the last few months. The final session for classified employees, which was at 10 a.m. Wednesday, focused on diversity issues in the workplace.

All classified employees received invitations from Wefald to attend one of the sessions.

"It wasn't a mandate coming from the president," said committee chairwoman Mordean Taylor-Archer. "We encouraged participation."

Taylor-Archer said the Diversity Campaign's goal is to "make the University more conducive to diversity."

Wednesday's session included a film called "Communication Across Cultures" and presentations by Susan Scott, Linda Morse and Jim Boyer.

Scott, assistant dean of student life, focused on various workplace issues, while Morse, administrative officer in continuing education, discussed gender-related issues.

Boyer, professor of curriculum instruction and educational policy, said he hoped all classified employees would now place diversity issues on their personal agendas.

During his presentation, Boyer cited a number of statistics about changes and problems in the country. He said the population is changing rapidly, and the changes will dramatically influence the workplace.

He said 30 percent of new jobs in Kansas in 1992 will require more training and qualification than current jobs. He said the median white family income is around $34,000, while for black families the figure is close to $18,000 a year.

Boyer emphasized that Kansas has 7,000 children in foster care, and 90 percent of prisoners in the state are men. While half of all American marriages will end in divorce, Boyer said 51 percent of divorced women will never remarry, but 80 percent of the men will marry again within two years.

These demographic changes require people to recognize and appreciate diversity in the working world, he said.

"You can't understand that diversity until you understand that we're all part of that mosaic," Boyer said.

"The University is a major work center for hundreds of people, and that workplace is changing rapidly."

Workers must relate to each other supportively rather than confrontationally.

"We now have to upgrade our relationships," he said. "America has made tremendous strides technologically. It has not made the same strides in human relationships."

The committee focused on administration and faculty during the spring of 1991, and after finishing with classified employees this semester, it will move on to work with students in the spring of 1992.

are making a difference."

Harris said she has seen a similar project like this done in Wichita, and it seemed to go over well.

Holly Smith, junior in early childhood education, said the children thought of the project.

"They are the ones who took the initiative," she said.

But Smith said it was hard to get the children motivated at first.

"We set goals for them every day to achieve. Our highest goal was to make 15 cards in one day."

The Christmas cards will be sold for 25 cents each.

to inefficiencies, lack of accountability and a tendency to become mired in mediocrity."

Scribner also refuted the COCAO statement, saying it did not put enough emphasis on student evaluations of faculty.

While the board's statement referred to an emphasis on quality, integrity and accessibility, she said, the COCAO statement referred only to quality and integrity. She said SAC wondered why accessibility was left out of the statement.

COCAO called for a per-credit-hour equipment fee, which Scribner said SAC believes is inconsistent with the board's tuition and fee policy.

"Students have the right to expect quality instruction and instructional facilities as a basic element of their education," she said. "These needs should be funded through the traditional methods of tuition and state appropriations."

SAC's public denunciation of the COCAO statement shocked many administrators and regents who thought they had student support.

When giving his report on the statement, K-State Provost James Coffman said he had student government support of COCAO's proposal.

K-State Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt said that was not so.

"He presented the statements to two members of (Student Senate Executive Committee) who had never seen them before. Of course, they're going to say 'yes' to the provost," Heitschmidt said.

Heitschmidt said he did not see the COCAO statement until last Friday and was unable to share it with the rest of the executive committee before Coffman visited with them.

In another area affecting K-State, the COCAO statement calls for an end of enrollment adjustments and the implementation of qualified admissions for regent schools.

In past years, regent schools have received additional funding from the state when their enrollments increased. This helped alleviate the funding stresses of more students and equipment shortages. In the 1990-1991 school year, K-State increased in enrollment but didn't receive an enrollment adjustment from the state.

water from leaking into the research areas, because it would take more plastic and buckets than they have.

"There is no way we could drape plastic in the environmental chambers," McCullough said. "We have simply given up on this area. We have let the water continue to leak inside."

Jones said the leaks are essentially in all parts of the ceiling in this area. The leakage in these rooms is so severe they have had trouble with collection buckets overflowing at times. Room 201D, which is the main office, needs to be covered, Jones said, but because of the many doors and the nature of the use of this room, this is difficult.

"Damage has been controlled so far," Jones said. "We've had one computer damaged, numerous stains on carpets, many ceiling tiles ruined, some papers and other materials wet, and the damage that has occurred to equipment in the environmental chambers area."

He said major leaks have usually started in the late afternoon or evening when he is around to see that some measure can be taken to minimize the damage.

"If they had occurred at times when no one was around, the damage could have been extensive," Jones said.

The Institute for Environmental Research researches projects such as thermal properties of protective clothing and sleeping bags. There are several funded projects being stored throughout the department that are being endangered by the leakage.

"I am working on three major projects now," McCullough said. "If water would leak onto them, there would be a specific amount of loss in time and money."

The current situation is affecting the function of the lab. In addition, it creates a poor image.

"It is important for the faculty to generate money for their research," McCullough said. "However, it is embarrassing to show company representatives our research facilities in their present condition."

For example, McCullough had a meeting with Robert Averell, who was working with her on one of her projects. She met him somewhere else because she was embarrassed about the current situation.

Maintenance is currently working on the roof.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*With a little help from her friends

A wonderful thing happened on the K-State campus Tuesday. It was the kind of thing that makes you smile in the face of tragedy and makes you think there are good people in the world after all.

In this dog-eat-dog, "what's in it for me" world, who would have thought that about 900 people would be willing to give their bone marrow to help out a K-State student dying of leukemia.

Apparently not the drive coordinators, who only had enough supplies to test 300.

It was the biggest drive ever in Kansas and the first on a Kansas college campus.

Not only did the drive increase Julie Fabrizio's chance to find an unrelated donor, which she needs badly, but it increased the number of people in Kansas' donor bank by almost 50 percent.

Fabrizio said though her life depends on finding a donor for herself, her other motivation was to increase the number of people in the donor bank, which might save the life of other leukemia victims.

True, a lot of the donors probably knew Julie and were doing it for her. But chances are, most of those 900 people didn't know her, and chances are even greater that they wouldn't know the recipient of their marrow if the match was made through the donor bank.

Julie, her friends and supporters and, most of all, the 900 people who showed up should be feeling pretty proud right about now. They deserve it.

Heitschmidt's finale what we expected

Todd Heitschmidt is one class act.

Our old pal, Todd, fired his friend, Fred Wingert, earlier this week before the run-off election. Heitschmidt said he was angered by statements Wingert allegedly made in the Collegian.

As expected, Heitschmidt has played the final card in presidential poker. He ensured that no one who disagreed with him succeeded him.

In an election that was relatively clean, honorable and downright good-spirited, it took our old student body president to throw in the mud.

Well, student body, let us bid goodbye to Heitschmidt's antics and welcome Jackie McClaskey to the office of the president.

May McClaskey learn from Heitschmidt's bad examples and run the office tighter, more ethically and more effectively.

Perhaps the bitter irony in this whole election thing is the one weasel who has graced these editorials more times this year than our esteemed Gov. Joan Finney, the great President George Bush and the successor to the devil, Saddam Hussein, will now be on the Board of Student Publications. Touche.

Mm-mm goodLook what Joan's cooking up now

Yes, there's certainly good news for the people of Kansas.

Our beloved governor, Joan Finney, is being celebrated for something besides her amazing ability to accomplish nothing and look stupid doing it.

The December issue of Midwest Living magazine features Joan Finney's recipe for her "Kansas German-Chocolate Pie." And, make no mistake, it's mm-mm good. In fact, the food editor of the magazine says it's one of her favorites.

Now, some would fault Joan and accuse her of spending too much time in the kitchen and not enough in the capitol. We here at the Collegian, though, prefer to take a different approach.

After months of indifference, Joan, whether she realizes it or not, has finally hit upon the solution to the problems of property tax relief, school financing and crunches in the SRS department — a gigantic bake sale.

Yes, if Joan's baking ability is as good as Midwest Living says it is, the state of Kansas is only a few hundred thousand "Kansas German-Chocolate Pies" away from deliverance.

The Collegian is pretty proud of this idea, and we hope Joan feels free to use it.

After all, it's better than anything else she's come up with lately.

Christmas Shopping ListJARED GREGOIRE

Granted, there are still 40 shopping days left until Christmas.

But for members of Congress and nearly everyone else associated with the governing process, Christmas is a year-round event, chocked full of stockings stuffed to the brim with moral and financial abuses.

Bounced check returns roasting on an open fire

Anyway, in keeping with the Yuletide tradition and believing politicians may have been children once, I've written up my Christmas list of toys for those certain few I believe are deserving, even if they have already received plenty of gifts.

Having already checked my list twice, I find it is somewhat scarce this year. But worry not, you recipients. President Bush is adamant that we are not in a recession, so I'm sure the list is far more fruitful than if he thought we were actually in the midst of economic chaos. Lucky you.

We begin with our president. For George, he gets the World Wimp Federation Mid East Wrestling Game. Oh, how his face will light up when he pits Syria's Hafez "The Garter Snake" al-Hassad against Egypt's Hosni "Hitman" Mubarak. It also comes with other figures, except my favorite: Saddam "Atomic Bomb" Hussein. I suppose his version is so in demand the manufacturer just plum ran out.

And because he's been such a good boy, I think George should also get the Official Domestic Policy Board Game. Our George will have hours of fun when he finds out he gets to keep all the money. Plus, his board players never have to Go To Jail (they even pass "Go" every time), and he can cancel any constructive programs in support of defense spending. Just what he's always wanted!

For Vice President Dan Quayle — the Boom-Boom pellet rifle, since his father never allowed him to learn how to shoot a real one. And Dan will really get a kick when he learns that the Boom-Boom transforms into a lovely golf putter.

For Louisiana gubernatorial candidate David Duke, I looked long and hard and found a marvelous little choice: the Swamp Dude Bayou Blaster, complete with scum sucking bio-mask. This little ditty should come in handy for fending off those nasty protesters (especially the black ones) come election time. I even included extra batteries, knowing he'll probably be using it quite a bit.

And for ol' Dave's opponent, Edwin Edwards, he gets the "Rocketeer" LCD video game. The neat thing about this hand-held wonder is that you get to kill nasty Nazis and rescue hostages, assuredly from the grips of white supremacists, at the same time. Talk about a gift seemingly meant for that one special person!

For Robert Gates, the new head of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Clarence Thomas, the newest Supreme Court justice, I thought and thought and decided they truly deserve the Batguy Super Nominee Body Armor set, which comes with one of those cool spring-loaded tether line shooters.

Now, whenever people suspect they may not be qualified for some position, these two can slip on the body armor to deflect any stinging barbs slung in their direction. And if the armor fails, well, heck, they just shoot a rope through the nearest window and escape before anyone can say something really important.

Being head of the CIA, I'm sure Robert will truly appreciate the niftiness of these James Bond-like gadgets. As for Clarence, I'm sure he'll come to appreciate my little package in time.

Oh, and I surely couldn't forget our Gov. Joan Finney. Being one of my favorite people, I went out extra early and purchased one of those Playtime Ice Cream makers. Now, Joan can freeze budgets (especially those pesky education ones) at will.

Not only that, the ice cream maker also comes with an instant liquefier. With it, she can take all those eggheads trying to tell her how to run the government, toss them in the liquefier, mix in some spices and bingo! Eggnog for her mansion guests!

And finally, for Surgeon General Antonia Novella, a Ban-o-Matic. I'm sure my little present will prove handy when those damed beer makers ignore her plea to "voluntarily" quit advertising their products.

LETTERSObscenities don't impress readers

Editor,

Once again, I have opened a Collegian and wondered why an outstanding paper is compelled to shock and attack its readers with obscenities like those printed in the Nov. 4 George Carlin article.

Maybe you think having the word "pr-cks" on the front page shows how informative and educational the Collegian is. Or maybe you thought you were going to impress someone with your ability to print foul language and get away with it. I don't understand why you thought you had to print half of Carlin's vulgar vocabulary when the rest of the writing in this article was good enough to stand on its own.

When you print this kind of expressive literature, you're not showing how well the First Amendment works, you're just showing that the editors and writers of the Collegian are so unsure of their literary talent, they have to use obscenities to keep the readers' attention. Why didn't you print the obscene language using spaces in place of certain letters? It might all mean the same thing, but it shows respect for your readers, and besides, I'm sure most of us can figure out what sh-t means.

I'm not a Bible thumper. I cuss like a trucker in a four-letter-word contest. I just don't do it in front of 20,000 people. I like most of Carlin's skits, but the article crossed way over the line when it didn't take into consideration that some people still take offense to open displays of foul language and obscenity. You might say something like, "Well, you don't have to read it" or "The article had a warning," but how would you feel if I showed up on your momma's front porch wearing a shirt that said "F-ck you, b-tch"? Hey, she doesn't have to read it, and even if it had a warning, she would probably read it anyway.

If you want to come across as a mature, top-rated, respected paper, have a little class and respect your readers. Be big enough not to jump on the obscenity bandwagon. Little kids might laugh and giggle at the "dirty" words in your articles, but those of us who grew up years ago don't think you're that cool.

Suicide machine neither good nor evil

Editor,

Your editorial about the suicide machine in Wednesday's paper is a subject all of us will face. Death is something common to everyone; it is the last experience of everyone's life. Sooner or later, doctors must realize that their profession has its limits.

Kevorkian's machine is neither good nor evil. How it is used is the issue. Does our society have the wisdom to ensure that the machine is used only for humane purposes? For many of us, it is easy to have visions of concentration camps, America's version of "the final solution." However, it may be more realistic to believe that doctors, seeing that many of us don't desire suffering from a terminal illness, will find a way to profit from euthanasia, as they do from keeping people "alive."

We must remember that our Constitution is not an economic document, but a political one — a secular statement of natural law, not one of materialism.

Apathy abounds in young Americans

Editor,

In the days following the election Nov. 5 and 6, we heard how pleased supporters of the library and Rec Complex were with voter turnout and results. After all, it was the largest turnout ever at K-State. I, for one, am not at all impressed with the voter turnout. About 25 percent of the student body exercised their right — make that duty — to vote in the election. Are we to assume that the other 75 percent of the students just don't care enough about what happens on our campus to take five minutes from their busy schedules?

Unfortunately, these results only confirm the fact that young adults in America show the poorest voter turnout of any other age group. If any of you have complained about the drinking age lately, we can only thank ourselves for that one. Former President Ronald Reagan knew just how weak we were as a voting class when he pushed to raise the drinking age to 21. We have managed to bark about the issues, yet fail when it comes to adding to the bite. Until we learn how to bite, our political friends in Washington, D.C., will go on ignoring our "voteless voices."

Old tests test ability to make new tests

Editor,

In contrast to the views of Professor Franke that were reported in the Collegian Nov. 8, I feel making old tests available to students is good.

First, it gives students an opportunity to learn what type of test an instructor gives. Secondly, I feel students can learn by answering questions on old tests.

I advocate placement of old tests on reserve in one of K-State's libraries. By so doing, these tests become available to all who are interested in seeing and using them. The only drawback to making old tests available in this manner is that this would require an instructor to make up new tests every semester.

Panel promotes student beliefs, attitudes, needs

Speakers discuss how social issues affect college students' lives

By the Collegian Staff

Sex, K-State, alcohol and making change were just a few of the topics discussed Thursday at a student panel, "What's Really on the Minds of College Students," in the K-State Union.

University Counseling Services Director Fred Newton led the discussion which was open to the public. The panel consisted of five K-State students.

Susan Scott, assistant dean of student life, said the students were chosen based on their ability to speak in front of a group and as representatives of different segments of the K-State population.

Newton said the student panel was an inservice for institutional advancement to heighten awareness of student beliefs and attitudes. It will help prepare and educate the student services, he said, staff about college students' needs and what is happening in their lives.

The panel began with introductions and panel members recalling their most memorable moments at college. Robert Karlin, fifth-year senior in architecture, and Mary Jane O'Connor, senior in interior design, both mentioned the reorganization effort and protests.

"I thought it was exciting to see what can be done when the numbers of students get together," O'Connor said. "It made us realize the power of our own voices."

After the introductions, the discussion moved on to current social issues and how they affect college students' lives. Newton asked students for their opinions about sex and AIDS in our society.

Ian Bautista, junior in pre-law, addressed this question by relating to Magic Johnson's contraction of the HIV virus.

"I think it's a sad statement for our society when it takes a male role model of society to contract a virus in order to bring attention to it," he said.

Monrovia Scott, junior in industrial engineering, said sex among college students is happening, but it's not being discussed.

Bryan Johnson, senior in marketing, said, "Some of the guys I know think of this as being a more conservative community, so they think they're safe. I've also seen a lot of freshman go a little wild when they first get to school, but on down the line they begin to go back to some of their old values."

Students were also asked what they would change about K-State if they had the power. Karlin said he would have the administration work with the Legislature on ways to allocate money.

Bautista said he would change the core curriculum.

"I would make white folks learn about black folks, as well as themselves. This would include changing the way the classes are taught by adding more diversity," he said.

A study of K-State students' concerns was conducted about 10 years ago by Newton, Scott and other faculty members.

"We have been toying with the idea of going back and redoing the study," Newton said. "The panel was one way to get started on it."

Swine Day draws crowd

Industry behind, needs to improve fast, Connor says

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

Pork producers from across the Midwest came to the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome to learn techniques to get them ahead in the swine industry during KSU Swine Day.

Events of Swine Day included a trade show with exhibits ranging from swine feed and medicine to feeder equipment and computer programs, a tour of the university's swine unit and a series of programs and receptions.

Joe Connor, graduate of the University of Illinois and a practicing veterinarian from Carthage, Ill., gave the keynote speech, "Herd Health Considerations for the Year 2000."

Connor said the key to getting ahead in the swine industry is to optimize the pork lean gain, and such gain must be met by keeping the swine in good health. The lack of better measures of disease prevention and elimination has held the industry behind.

"We need to move ahead boldly," Connor said. "We wonder why weren't these programs currently being used more successfully."

"The answer is that traditional vaccines and treatments are just not enough to prevent disease from spreading in the large and growing industry."

Connor suggested and explained different programs of modeling and new vaccines and pulse medications.

More than 500 people from Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri came for the event. K-State students from the colleges of agriculture, veterinary medicine and business administration were also in attendance.

"The crowds are surprising, but they are so large because of the reputation of the program," said Jim Nelssen, associate professor of animal sciences and industry and Swine Day co-ordinator.

"We feel like we have an awfully good program that can compete with any other in the country."

what they can tell us," he said.

Bob and Sally Berrell of Fargo, N.D., who lost their son, Steven, 20, in the crash, said they were relieved at news of the indictments but also realistic about the justice process.

"It's just the first step in a long string of things that have to happen now if justice is going to be served and the people of the world are going to know what happened," Sally Berrell said.

"It's good news but not really enough," said Peter Lowenstein of Mendham, N.J., whose son Alexander, 21, was another Lockerbie victim. He said further information is needed on whether Syria, Iran or others were involved.

Lowenstein said, "They're the ones who shot the bullets. We want to know who paid for the bullets," Lowenstein said referring to those indicted.

Swire and other British and American relatives of the victims met in the Scottish capital of Edinburgh last week with the lord advocate, Lord Fraser of Carmyllie, the British government law officer in charge of the investigation into the bombing.

"I met the lord advocate on Friday, and I certainly came away from the meeting feeling optimistic about how the criminal investigation was going," Swire said.

Snyder's stock soaring

Enjoy watching Bill Snyder work the sidelines Saturday.

It might be the last time you have the chance to do so without leaving Manhattan.

K-State's third-year coach is one of the hottest coaching commodities anywhere, and a pair of wins in the last two games would leave him with a 7-4 record in 1991 as coach at a school whose football program was the laughing stock of college sports just five short years ago.

Anybody looking to hire a coach? A few schools most assuredly will be, and they're likely to be schools with a bit more football tradition and a bit larger bankroll than what exist here.

Try Ohio State, LSU, USC and Arizona State for starters. Each of these schools — two of which are traditional gridiron powers and the other two of which have strong total athletic programs — still have coaches in place.

And, yes, it would be speculation to think that any of these programs would be looking for a coach at season's end.

But it is most assuredly not speculation to believe that there will be good jobs up for grabs out there, and that the name of the possible National Coach of the Year would be prominent in discussions of any and all of these openings.

Yes, Snyder has been talked about as Hayden Fry's possible — make that probable — successor at Iowa. But Fry shows no signs of slowing down, and he probably will be the Hawkeye coach until he wins another Big Ten title. That prospect is out of the question for 1991, thanks to Michigan.

So Snyder, who would be a logical choice to return to the university he served so well as offensive coordinator, may be frozen out of this job by the long-term goals of Fry.

Where does that leave a man who took on a program with a 30-game losing streak and now might have a seven-win season in just his third year as head coach?

It leaves him caught between the proverbial rock and a hard place.

Should I stay or should I go?

If Snyder stays, he faces the prospect of having seasons with not as many victories. Wins lead to respect, and respect helps coaches get jobs.

The theory, it seems, is to win as many as you can when you can, and get on to bigger and better things before someone starts throwing stones at your glass house.

If Snyder goes, he could be forfeiting the chance to become the Iowa coach, and he could be forfeiting the chance to finalize the job he's started here.

No, Snyder has never revealed his plan for the revitalization of the Wildcat program. But he most assuredly has one. And it probably doesn't stop short of a run for the Big Eight title and repeated trips to postseason bowl games.

With no bowl game in sight this year — thanks to the probability of just six wins against Division I-A teams rather than the "agreed to" seven — a quick exit by Snyder would appear to leave unfinished business in Manhattan.

Snyder strikes one as a man who would like to finish what he's started.

But one has to wonder how long any of us would wait before moving on if the opportunity presented itself.

Snyder will likely get a few phone calls at the end of this year, and on the other end of those calls will likely be athletic directors dangling cars, cash and warmer climates.

Will he resist? Only Snyder knows for sure.

But who could blame him if he leaves? He's already done more for this program than even the most optimistic dreamer could possibly have imagined going in, and he's done it with class.

Lady Cats take new look to court

German team offers tough test for newcomers

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

The day has finally arrived. After a long wait, the 1991-92 version of the Lady Cats will be unveiled tonight in Bramlage Coliseum K-State opens the preseason portion of its season against the German National Team.

This year should prove to be more than just a new season, however, as the Lady Cats mesh six returning players with seven newcomers in an attempt to replace three 1,000-point scorers — Nadira Hazim, Diana Miller and Kristie Bahner.

That trio led last year's team to a 16-11 record and a second-place Big Eight finish.

With so many new faces at practice, Coach Susan Yow has had to make a transition of her own. Veteran leaders have been replaced by players without college experience.

"We're moving much slower than what you may do with a more experienced team. I'm more of a person that puts the part method in, then the whole."

Susan Yow

"We're moving much slower than what you may do with a more experienced team," Yow said. "I'm more of a person that puts the part method in, then the whole."

"We've worked mainly against man to man. If the team runs zone (defense) on us, we will just have to make some adjustments from the bench. We haven't really talked much about zones, either offensively or defensively. But I will say that, with what we have in, the players are beginning to understand concepts, both offensively and defensively. I think that's the most important thing."

The cupboard of returning players won't be bare, however. The Lady Cats return two senior starters in point guard Mary Jo Miller and 6-foot-2 center Jennifer Grebing.

Miller, a first-team academic all-Big Eight selection last season, played on the Big Eight Select Team that traveled to Brazil last summer.

Grebing was an honorable-mention selection to the academic team.

"We will try to play a lot of different people," Yow said. "We are looking at this as a learning and teaching situation for us. Sure we want to win. We'd like to do well, but more than that, we'd really like to learn something from the game."

The Nationals are 2-2 on their U.S. tour with wins over Oklahoma State (74-50) and UMKC (68-60). They have dropped decisions to Southwest Missouri State (78-68) and Wichita State (95-92).

"The thing that you have to realize about the Germans is that although they have only played five games, they've been practicing together since Sept. 7," Yow said.

In addition to the disadvantage in playing time, the Lady Cats will have to adjust to playing against an international team, which entails a varied style of play, Yow said.

She was also ready to get on the court to determine where the best shots would come from in the offense and who would be the "green light" for shooting privileges.

Although things will get underway tonight, Yow stressed the importance of everyday improvement.

"We're going to have to take it a game at a time, a week at a time," Yow said.

Tigers obstruct winning season

Snyder won't judge improvement until Cats are finished with season

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

For as good as K-State's football season has been, Coach Bill Snyder resists assessing the team's improvement over last season.

He'll let the Wildcats' remaining two games aid his evaluation.

While K-State's 5-4 record matches the number of wins recorded last season, Snyder said the final two games are crucial to making the season a success.

"We're still sitting at 5-4, and I don't know that that is a great accomplishment," Snyder said. "That parallels where we were last year. I think once the season is completed, you have the opportunity to look back and make a clear designation of where you are as a team."

In their meeting with Missouri Saturday, the Cats see the opportunity to secure the first winning season at K-State since 1982. Snyder emphasized that improvement shouldn't be judged strictly on the basis of wins and losses. He admitted, however, that posting a winning record would be an important step for the program.

"I think it means a great deal, because these youngsters have not participated on a winning college football team," Snyder said. "It would mean a great deal to our seniors, because it allows them to go out having accomplished some things at K-State that few have been able to accomplish."

"It really would make a difference to come out (with a winning record) instead of 5-6," senior Frank Hernandez said. "The new guys aren't really used to the losses and the tradition of losing. For them, their first season would be a winning season. It would really make them believe that they can win in the future."

Saturday's contest, however, represents not only an opportunity for K-State to establish a winning record but also an obstacle the Cats have not cleared since 1985. The Tigers hold a string of five wins over K-State, none of which were more disappointing to the Cats than last year's.

K-State entered the game last season on a similar winning note, taking a 4-2 record to Columbia. The Cats' inability to finish long drives, combined with big pass plays by Missouri quarterback Kent Kiefer, led to a frustrating 31-10 loss for K-State.

"We went into that game really optimistic about how we were going to play, and then we just didn't show up," Hernandez said. "It was probably the most disappointing loss we had last year."

This year, Missouri appears to be playing the role of a spoiler. At 3-5-1, the Tigers hope to ruin the Cats' hopes of a winning record. Snyder said the Tigers are looking to gain respect in beating a program similar to their own.

"They're going to try to prove that we're the K-State of old," defensive end Elijah Alexander said. "Everybody compares the two programs, because Snyder has been here two years and (Missouri coach Bob) Stull has, too. They're a trash-talking team, and they thought they had better facilities and better athletes. But we're progressing faster than they are, and they want to try to upset us."

The Tigers have struggled since beating Illinois and Memphis State in non-conference contests. Missouri's defense against the run has been a primary concern for Stull since entering Big Eight play. The Tigers have surrendered an average of 380 yards rushing in their five conference games.

Snyder warned that those numbers

Spikers to play Missouri

A long season is coming to an end. The K-State volleyball team plays its last home game of the season against the Missouri Tigers at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

K-State enters the match with a conference record of 1-8. The Wildcats' only win was on the road at Missouri. K-State won the match in four games.

Coach Patti Hagemeyer said she wants an end to the Cats' three-game losing streak.

"I think a win is what the team is shooting for," Hagemeyer said. "The team now is physically stronger than the first time we played Missouri."

Since a disappointing loss to KU 10 days ago, coaches gave the players two days off.

"We gave them a four-day physical break over the weekend," Hagemeyer said. "We had some wearing bodies. No significant injuries, but the players were tired."

Hagemeyer said the remaining days of practice during the layoff were more intense.

Despite a good week of practice and a win in the two teams' first match, Missouri will be a competitive opponent for the Cats.

"I think there aren't a lot of differences between us," Hagemeyer said. "I think we both have the ability to play well, but both teams haven't had much confidence to play well consistently."

K-State had the better end of the outcome in the first meeting, but Hagemeyer said the team didn't play its best volleyball.

"I don't think that the first game against Missouri was an exceptional performance for us," she said. "And I hope that we'll play them better Saturday."

Harriers ready for Region V meet

Capriotti says Big 8 meet effort not good enough

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

It's so close that John Capriotti can taste it, yet so far away it often seems unattainable.

"It's a trip to the NCAA Cross Country Championships."

Capriotti's squads will determine Saturday in Augusta whether they'll be a part of the national meet on Nov. 25 in Tucson, Ariz.

At this weekend's Region V meet at the RAFT Golf Course, K-State's men's and women's teams will go head to head with the top teams from the Big Eight in addition to the best squads from the Missouri Valley and Gateway conferences.

The K-State coach said his teams will have to perform better than they did at the Big Eight meet to gain those elusive national berths.

"Both teams are definitely going to have to run better than they did at the Big Eight meet to go," he said. "We need to go out and compete and race better."

In the men's race, Capriotti said the Region V favorite is Iowa State, which ran away with the Big Eight meet by placing each of its five top runners in the top six overall.

"I look for us, KU, Southern Illinois and Illinois State to battle it out for the second spot," Capriotti said of those who will compete for the No. 2 — and final — national meet berth attainable at the Region V meet.

Nebraska is the women's field favorite, also coming off of a Big Eight meet title. Capriotti said he expects Iowa State and Missouri to battle K-State for the second national spot available, and said his team has an outside chance of battling Nebraska for the region crown.

"We need people to run the way they're capable of running, obviously," he said. "But if they do, the women should make it."

Though Capriotti noted all performers are key to a team scoring effort in cross country, he pointed to three in particular who must do well this weekend to see their teams advance to nationals.

"Ron Smith needs to run back up to where he's capable of running," Capriotti said of the men's race. "And Janet Treiber and Paulette Staats need to go out more aggressively in the women's race."

Cats hope to iron out wrinkles

Search for 'chemistry' continues as several new players try to blend

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

The time has arrived for the last dress rehearsal.

The K-State men's basketball team will battle the Michigan AAU squad in the second game of a hoops doubleheader at 7:30 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game will be the second and final exhibition game for the Cats, who downed the Ukraine National Team 63-57 on Nov. 7. K-State opens the regular season on Nov. 23 in Bramlage against Texas-San Antonio.

K-State point guard Marcus Zeigler and Coach Dana Altman agreed the team's effort against the Ukraine Nationals left quite a bit to be desired in two specific areas.

"The boards and defense are things we can control," said Zeigler, who scored five points and handed out a pair of assists in 28 minutes in the exhibition opener, "and we didn't get after them like we should have."

Altman said K-State's poor rebounding work was puzzling.

"We can have, and should have, a good rebounding team," he said of his unit, which was out-rebounded 35-32 by the Ukraine team. "But the players have to make that more of a priority."

Exhibition games are times in which teams work on things that need improvement — like rebounding and defense — and attempt to develop that all-important team togetherness, Zeigler said.

"Right now, we're just trying to find a chemistry and get everybody molded together," he said.

Altman said that process is progressing nicely, though he concedes that a championship-caliber team won't be built overnight.

"It's going to take a while," he said. "It's going to come, but we've got a long way to go."

K-State's starting lineup for tonight's contest against the Michigan AAU squad, which is sponsored by Flint, Mich., attorney Sam Ragnone,

At the guard slots are Zeigler and Vincent Jackson, who drew praise from Altman for his work on the boards against the Ukrainians. He had nine rebounds and scored 10 points in 29 minutes.

At center will be Wylie Howard. Howard had but one point in the exhibition opener, but will be replacing John Rettiger, who was scoreless.

The forward tandem of Askia Jones and Deryl Cunningham will remain unchanged. Jones had a team-high 17 points in the opener.

Altman said he's still searching for the right combination to put on the floor.

"At this point in time, we're looking for effort on the court," he said.

Free agents start the bidding game

Bucs' Bonilla slated for visits to Phillies, Mets

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bobby Bonilla's pursuit of a new team begins this weekend when the free-agent outfielder visits the New York Mets and the Philadelphia Phillies.

Bonilla, who hit .302 last season with 18 homers and 100 RBIs for Pittsburgh, will visit Philadelphia on Saturday and New York on Sunday, according to a source familiar with the situation, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Dennis Gilbert, Bonilla's agent, would not comment on the specifics of negotiations. However, he said Thursday that Bonilla's planning was still in the preliminary stage.

"Not much has happened yet," Gilbert said.

The outfielder rejected an $18.5-million, four-year offer to re-sign with the Pirates. It is expected that he will receive a five-year deal worth at least $25 million.

Meanwhile, the Mets showed interest in signing pitcher Rick Sutcliffe, who was 6-5 with a 4.10 ERA for the Chicago Cubs.

"There's probably six or eight teams that have indicated at least a preliminary interest," said Barry Axelrod, Sutcliffe's agent. "We'll probably be having even more meaty discussions and exchanging proposals."

Axelrod also represents first baseman Wally Joyner, who had spent his entire career with California before becoming free. Joyner hit .301 with 21 homers and 96 RBIs.

"The Mets are also interested in him, but that is a team that Wally has less interest in than a number of others," Axelrod said.

Mets general manager Al Harazin said he had been talking to agents for a number of players.

"I've been in a series of conversations," Harazin said. "To pick anyone out would be to give it disproportionate attention."

The New York Yankees are interested in third baseman Steve Buechele. "I've been contacted by eight clubs," said Buechele's agent, Alan Meersand. "And I haven't spoken to the Oakland A's yet, but I know they need a third baseman."

winless in the Big Eight. Like K-State, the Tigers' last game was against KU. Missouri lost to the Jayhawks in three games, scoring just five points during the match.

For K-State, motivation won't be a problem. First, the spikers have to win in order to avoid a tie with Missouri for last place in the Big Eight Conference.

But maybe a more motivating reason to win is the fact that it will be last match for senior Rhonda Hughes in Ahearn.

"The statistics would tell you that they have had some difficulty in stopping the run, but looking back over the schedule, they have given up an awful lot of yards to Indiana, Baylor, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Colorado — among the very best rushing teams in the country," Snyder said. 'Fantasia' is fantastic

Disney revokes promise, releases classic on video

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF

Walt Disney and the Disney Studios animators must have been on something heavy when they created "Fantasia" more than 50 years ago.

The animation masterpiece was restored to its original color and format, and the Leopold Stokowski soundtrack was remastered for the film's 50th anniversary re-release last fall.

VIDEO REVIEW

The overall effect in the theater was stunning, and Disney Studios proclaimed "Fantasia," like its fellow animation classic Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, would never be released on video.

That prophecy was undone this fall when "Fantasia" was released on video.

The $2.3-million classic, which was always intended for adults, failed miserably after its first release in 1940. Not until the late 1960s did the film gain popularity when it was discovered to be a head-trip film of stellar proportions.

The idea for "Fantasia" was conceptualized as a marriage of sight and sound. The stirring animation, combined with the dynamic performance of the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by the great Leopold Stokowski, brings an effect into the home that boggles the mind.

Beginning with Bach's "Toccatina and Fugue in D Minor," Stokowski and the orchestra begin as the center of attention for the visual play of light, color and shadow. But as the piece continues and live action gives way to animation, the gates of Disney's mind open.

The screen springs to life and floods the viewer with an abstract whirlwind of light and color. Violin bows turn into creatures of flight in an ethereal netherworld. The sound ascends and crashes as it mixes with the maelstrom before the viewer's eyes.

The second sequence flows sweetly to the strains of Tchaikovsky's "The Nutcracker Suite." As the narrator explains, nothing remains of the nutcracker but the name. In a dance of the seasons, fairies come to life, spreading magic over everything they touch. Mushrooms prance about in choreographed enchantment.

The third part is what most people conjecture when they hear the word "Fantasia." Mickey Mouse makes his appearance in "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Broomsticks brought to life as water-bearing slaves by the novice magician march in relentless succession to Paul Dukas' fanciful piece as Mickey dreams of the elements at his command. Little does he know the floods he dreams are a reality.

But the imagination, with the help of the celestial artistry, cannot fail to Hollyday to visit campus

Jazz artist good, but often seems to be simply going through the motions

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

It's the kind of music Mr. Rogers used to stroll through his neighborhood on the way to Mr. Naegle's music store.

Toe-tappin', finger-snappin' jazz, that is.

And it's coming to Union Station.

MUSIC REVIEW

At 8:00 tonight, saxophone player Christopher Hollyday will bring his show to the K-State campus. An event that was originally scheduled to take place in McCain Auditorium, the cozy pseudo-bar aura of the smaller venue will undoubtedly accent the evening.

The Union Station, with its alcohol-and smoke-free atmosphere, hardly seems the place to hear a ripplin' jazz show. But Hollyday's sound is like a holiday — full of shiny, happy noises. Perfect for the clean-cut campus.

"Scorpio Rising," the opening track on his new CD "The Natural Moment," sports a collage of sounds like a new string of blinking Christmas lights. "Had to Be Brad" and "Point of Delirium" continue in the tradition of feel-good music.

His back-up band deserves mention as well. Brad Mehlau on piano exhibits a confident command of the instrument as does John Webber on bass and Ron Savage on drums. Savage produces a great Buddy Rich-type brush sound that begs to be mimicked in the goofiest of air playing.

Hollyday also includes a remake of Cole Porter's "Every Time We Say Goodbye" that would make my grandmother proud.

Hollyday, in his third album at the age of 21, continues the trend in jazz appreciation among a group of people who grew up listening to the simplistic offerings of Motley Crue and Van Halen types. The closest people like me ever got to jazz was high school stage band.

Artists like Hollyday and Harry Connick Jr. are bringing jazz to a whole new generation of audience. Not only is it a wide bridge in generation gaps, it's great music.

Hollyday has the potential to someday be a legend. He is more than a prodigy — his technical ability and love for the genre is evident. The only thing he lacks is the natural soul of veterans.

"We're basically a small law office. We'll handle anything that we don't consider to be fee generating," Karon said.

The type of cases student legal services handle aren't the kind of cases that usually would make a legal firm a lot of money, Stall said.

Other cases that most student legal services won't handle are civil suits or other types of suits against the University.

Internal grievance matters might include in-state fee disputes, residence hall board appeals or cheating charges. In other cases, internal grievances have included improper conduct by police and other civil-rights actions.

"It's not really unusual in a constitutional democracy to have a lawyer employed by the state take litigation against the state," said Charles DiMare, directing attorney for the legal services at the University of Massachusetts.

Massachusetts' student legal services program is an example of one that will file suits against the university for students.

"Between 1980 and 1986, 13 separate civil rights lawsuits in which students sought money from the university were filed," DiMare said.

All 13 cases were won by the students.

"Fifty percent of the suits were allegations of police misconduct and brutality, and twenty-five percent were unconstitutional conduct in student disciplinary actions," DiMare said.

As a result of these 13 cases, the student legal services program was shut down and reopened under a new name and without the ability to file any type of suit, DiMare said.

The change occurred because the university paid a lot of money when these lawsuits were won. It had to hire lawyers and expend large amounts of time in its defense, and the suits generated national and international publicity.

For these reasons, most university legal services do not allow suits against the university.

"If a student came to KU and was paying out-of-state tuition but felt that they had met the requirements for in-state tuition, we would not represent them in that matter. They would have to either handle it without legal counsel or hire an attorney from outside of the university," Rose Moreno, general counsel for the University of Kansas said.

Most student legal services do not handle university-student disputes because of a conflict of interest that arises in a situation where an attorney brings litigation against his or her employer, Karon said.

The artist is good, but too often he seems to be simply going through the motions. For example, the Cole Porter remake is impeccable, but it sure as hell isn't Cole Porter. Hollyday needs to let himself go, or at least do a better job of communicating that to the audience.

Granted, a CD is a bit of a sterile format to detect the qualities that make jazz so wonderful — the collective experience of mood alteration and the opportunity the genre opens up for improvisation.

I guess the only way to find out is to go hear Hollyday in person.

fly as Mickey takes command of the stars and oceans from the rocky perch of his dreams.

The movie screeches to a halt during Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Seeing the creation of the world and life upon it go on and on to the tedious and often repetitive measures is about as good as inducing sleep as a quart of vodka.

If not for a stirring battle of dinosaurs and the still elegant and forceful animation, this piece would cause even the most die-hard viewer to hit the fast-forward on the remote. The entire segment would be vastly improved if it was shorter.

The movie's cute sequence — you can't have a Disney picture without something cute — is Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." A day in the life of a mythical Greek land is vigorously brought to life. Love, encouraged by rosy-cheeked cupids, blossoms among graceful centaurs as a family of regal Pegasus grace the sky. But this scene really dazzles in the finale, when night takes over after Apollo's ride across the heavens is finished.

But the two best sequences are yet to come.

The ballet of ostriches, elephants, hippos and crocodiles to Pontachelli's popular "Dance of the Hours" can make even a K-Stater like ballet. The crocodiles throw the hippos about with ease. And the gangly ostriches move with a delightful smoothness.

Disney's animators show their strength in making a huge, oafish — and shy — hippo move with the grace of a master ballerina. The mind reels at visions of the large beast swooning into the arms of a romantic reptile. But the excitement builds to a climax in Moussorgsky's "The Night on Bald Mountain."

As ghosts flow from the crypts to the rocky peaks and demons prance, a Russian god weaves his spell and power from on high. The animation is impeccable as shadow and overwhelmingly dark forms glisten with life. Flames highlight the demon's malevolent face as he grins his evil smile and its minions dance in delight. His strength and power flex as he stretches his wings and claims his dominance over the night.

As the bell tolls and night gives way to dawn, worshippers march to Schubert's heavenly musical ending,

"Ave Maria." The voices sweep through the listener as if singing in a Gothic church. The animation falls a little short in this segment, but the effect is ideal when combined with the music.

In the end, no matter how great the animation or the music, the film's punch relies upon the medium through which it is heard and seen.

A 12-inch television with mono sound does not help the sweeping abstractness of the first segment come to life. The power is entirely lost without a large screen and a good sound system.

With both, "Fantasia," the first movie filmed in stereo, is a definite must for the home library.

Saturday, November 23, 8 p.m.

The memoirs of stripper Gypsy Rose Lee suggested this fable of a steamrolling stage mother who, in Kenneth Tynan's words "was forever pressing her children's noses to the grindstone of her own frustrated ambitions." Gypsy will transport you to the tough and sleazy world of vaudeville through the magic of a Broadway musical in the grand tradition. Arthur Laurents' book is first-rate, Stephen Sondheim's lyrics are right on the mark, and Jule Styne's score is his finest. So, as Rose's daughters would have put it, "Let us entertain you!"

"Best damn musical I've seen in years."

GTAs may strike due to problems

Better office conditions, smaller classes needed, English instructors say

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Graduate teaching assistants in English may go on strike if class size and office improvements are not made in the department.

Frank Douglas, president of the Student Association of Graduates in English, said the GTAs are tired of dealing with the current situation.

"We simply don't want to deal with it anymore," Douglas said. "We need conditions that allow our programs and ourselves to exist harmoniously, and we don't have those right now."

GTAs are requesting smaller English composition classes and better office conditions.

English composition class sizes increased by about four people per class this semester, Douglas said. That might not sound like much, he said, but to the GTAs who teach two sections, it means eight extra students and a lot more work.

"These eight extra students means almost 100 extra papers that we have to grade," Douglas said.

He said the extra students and added papers detract from the GTAs' own studies because more time is needed to teach composition.

Because of the amount of work it takes to teach English composition, GTAs have to take at least three years to finish their own degrees, he said.

"We didn't come out here to just teach English composition. We came out here to get our master's degrees," Douglas said. "If, ultimately, we find that all we're doing is teaching composition, then we're at the wrong place."

Improvements in the GTA office are also being requested.

"Their working conditions are unbelievably bad," Douglas said. "There are 27 people in one office, and some of them are even sharing desks."

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said the GTAs have some real concerns and that he sympathizes with them.

"I am committed to improve the conditions for the graduate assistants," Nicholls said. "They do a lot of teaching for us, and they are very important to our program."

Little could be done to improve the conditions of the GTAs this semester, but Nicholls said things should be better next spring.

"We have put a cap of 22 students for next spring in the English composition classes," Nicholls said.

Nicholls also said that more GTA office space has been made in Leasure Hall, and they will be able to move there in January.

Douglas said he knows if the GTAs decide to strike, it will turn the lives of their students upside down.

"It'll throw the undergraduates' lives into chaos," Douglas said, "but what the hell are we supposed to do? We've asked and asked and asked for improvements, but all they've done is throw our lives into chaos."

Jeff Henry, graduate student in English, said the only reason the GTAs are not striking now is because of Nicholls' commitment to work on their conditions.

"The only thing keeping us from going over the edge is our faith in Dean Nicholls," Henry said. "However, we won't wait forever to get things fixed."

Breast cancer increasing

One of every nine women now at risk to develop disease

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

Occurrences of breast cancer are increasing.

Today, women are at much higher risk of developing breast cancer than they were 20 years ago. In 1961, a woman had a one in 20 chance of developing breast cancer, according to an article in McCall's magazine.

HEALTH

Recent official reports state that one out of nine women is now at risk of getting breast cancer.

Since 1980, according to the McCall's article, there were four times as many deaths from breast cancer than from AIDS.

Among women ages 35-50, cancer is the leading cause of death. And breast cancer is the most common within this group.

The American Cancer Society says more than 38,000 women die from breast cancer each year. According to McCall's, half a million women will have died from breast cancer by the end of the decade. That is 10 times the number of men killed in action during the Vietnam War.

Scientists and clinicians face a mystery. They know the risk factors, but they cannot piece the puzzle together. They have said they believe only 5-10 percent of all breast cancer is hereditary.

"Every woman who has a first-degree relative with breast cancer, like a mother or daughter, has an increased risk of getting the disease," said

Catherine Barry, Women's Clinic supervisor at Lafene Health Center.

A high-fat diet low in dietary fiber and cigarette smoking have also been said to increase the risk of breast cancer. But only 30 percent of all women who develop breast cancer have an established risk factor.

"Scientists don't really know what the link is between the risk factors," Barry said. "No direct cause-effect relation has been proven yet."

What affects this and what doesn't is a controversial discussion. Barry said alcohol consumption, for instance, has been both related to and not related to the cancer.

Systematic research on breast cancer has been missing for decades, but the federal government does not give much financial support. In 1992, breast cancer research will receive $100 million. Breast cancer takes nearly

Stock market takes a plunge

Memories of 1987 have investors anxiously awaiting overseas trading results

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — After spending the weekend nervously contemplating the stock market's sudden plunge, investors looked to Monday's trading for clues about what it all means.

ECONOMY

Overseas markets had the chance to respond first to Friday's sell-off, which sent the New York Stock Exchange's top barometer into its fifth-largest decline in history.

Analysts said Sunday they expected foreign stocks to fall in concert with the 120-point drop by the Dow Jones average of 30 industrials. But, barring a huge reaction in Tokyo and London, answers about the significance of Friday's sell-off would have to come from U.S. trading.

Optimists thought it might be a time to go bargain-hunting. Pessimists wondered whether it was time to bail out.

The dive brought back ominous memories of October 1987, when the Dow fell 108 points one Friday.

But regardless of what happens next, analysts said Friday's drop was an acknowledgement by Wall Street that a recent round of lower interest rates is not magically curing the sick economy.

"It dramatizes the fact that we are not getting out of the recession," said Peter Canelo, chief investment strategist with County Natwest USA.

The sharp fall left traders wondering whether the market could hold onto the broad gains that began building after the Gulf War and pushed the Dow to several record highs.

After recovering from the losses suffered in the wake of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the Dow has spent most of this year trading above 2,850 points.

Analysts have viewed that mark as the "bottom" of a trading range. They said if stocks continue falling toward that level, the key will be whether they can pass through.

The Dow wound up Friday's session at 2,943.20.

"Will 2,850 hold, or will it break? That's the $64 question," said Jack Solomon, a stock analyst at Bear, Stearns & Co. Inc.

The catalyst for Friday's sell-off may well have been a move in Congress to limit the amount of interest banks can charge credit card users.

BIG DROP

The Dow Jones industrial averages took the fifth-largest drop in its history Friday after several troublesome economic reports were released last week.

Source: Associated Press

GREG BRANSON/Collegian

Banks said that would depress their earnings while prompting them to cut off credit to many consumers, thereby pounding other sectors of the economy.

"They must immediately put away this credit card thing," Canelo said. Indeed, Vice President Dan Quayle indicated Sunday that President Bush would veto the measure if need be.

But even if the interest rate cap now fails, analysts said Sunday, that would probably not be enough to quickly put stocks back near the record highs they have hit in recent weeks.

Inconveniences hinder recycling

Majority of waste dumped in landfill could be saved

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Recycling by Manhattan citizens saved half a million pounds of waste from ending up in the Riley County landfill this past summer.

ENVIRONMENT

Although one-half million pounds were salvaged, Riley County Landfill still averages 110 tons of waste a day, said Dan Harden, Riley County Public Works director.

Sixty to 70 percent of waste dumped daily could be recycled, and the majority of waste received is paper products, Harden said.

It is estimated that about half of the community recycles one or more of the four basic recyclable materials — glass, newsprint, plastic and aluminum cans — said Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling. Seventy-five percent of the recyclers are individuals or families, and the other 25 percent are businesses and organizations.

There is only a small minority, however, that recycles more than one of the four other materials such as steel cans, other paper products, scrap metal, cardboard and batteries.

Roger Burns, K-State graduate and Manhattan resident, and his four roommates are an exception. They recycle aluminum, tin, colored glass, clear glass, paper, plastic bags and brown grocery sacks. They started a year and a half ago after purchasing recycling bins from Wal-Mart, Burns said.

"We're not on a glory stand to save the environment," Burns said. "We're a wasteful society. We're a society of

Duke's loss affects politics

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Republicans have been spared having to deal with a Gov. David Duke, but his explosive candidacy is already helping to shape the 1992 political season.

For Republicans, the challenge is to reclaim their traditional conservative themes and at the same time avoid association with the white-supremacist messenger who appropriated them.

Democrats, for their part, will try to link Duke's brand of racial politics with President Bush for as long as possible — despite Bush's denunciation of him and Duke's decisive loss Saturday to Edwin Edwards in the Louisiana governor's race.

Duke combined calls for less government and lower taxes with attacks on affirmative action, quotas, welfare, illegitimate births and forced busing.

Some of those themes have been used by Bush — and Ronald Reagan before him. Charles Black, a Republican consultant expected to play a key role in Bush's re-election effort, said Sunday that Duke's emergence won't change that.

CORRECTION

Due to a reporter's error, the Nov. 15 Collegian story, "Holiday card sale begins," incorrectly stated that the Hoeftin Child-Care Center project benefits the Flint Hills Breadbasket. The funds actually go to the K-State Child Development Center. The Collegian regrets the error.

NATION

Half of America could lose credit cards

WASHINGTON (AP) — As many as 60 million Americans could lose their charge cards and the economy could return to recession if Congress forces a reduction in credit card interest rates, bankers say.

"Something like this gets to every consumer's pocketbook," said Mark Riedy, president of the National Council of Community Bankers. "Is it the straw that breaks the camel's back and leads us back into another recession? If it goes through, it certainly could."

Based on a spot check of a dozen major card-issuing banks, the American Bankers Association estimates that nearly half the nation's 120 million MasterCard and Visa users would lose their cards.

Those who keep them could face sharply reduced credit limits, higher annual fees and loss of the standard 25-day grace period before interest is applied, the group said.

"The Congress that bounces checks at its own bank should not try to tell real banks how to run their business," said Philip Corwin, the group's director of operations and retail banking.

A plan to impose a floating ceiling on rates won overwhelming endorsement in the Senate last week, a day after President Bush suggested banks bring down the rates on their own.

On Friday, the Dow Jones average of industrial stocks plummeted 120.31 points, the steepest drop in two years. Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady blamed the fifth-worst decline on the Senate legislation and predicted the market would rebound.

"I don't expect that legislation ever to see the light of day and I think the market will understand that," Brady said Sunday on NBC's "Meet The Press." "This is wacky, senseless legislation."

Brady said the legislation would "result in credit cards which are elitist; the only people who would have credit cards would be the rich people."

Turkeys to be guests, not main course

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) — Stewart and Terri David plan to serve turkeys on Thanksgiving Day.

But these birds won't be cooked. They're the guests, sharing the couple's stuffed squash, sweet potatoes, dinner rolls and pumpkin pie to protest farmers' treatment of the birds, explained David, 42, of Asheville.

Critics say the birds' beaks are trimmed to keep them from pecking each other, they're raised in overcrowded buildings, and they're given chemicals and antibiotics that may threaten human health.

"Some people are into saving them rather than serving them," activist Karin Yates, 30, told The Charlotte Observer.

North Carolina is the nation's top turkey-producing state.

North Carolina Poultry Federation President Ed Woodhouse said processors aren't apologizing.

Man commits suicide, teenager killed

POMPANO BEACH, Fla. (AP) — A teen-ager was killed in a crash at an intersection where a man had deliberately crashed his truck into a pole, police said.

Willie Wright, 46, drove his truck into a utility pole, stumbled out, stabbed himself in the chest behind a church nearby and then tried to drown himself in a baptismal pool, said police spokeswoman Sandra King.

Wright was found by Officer Dennis Van Hartsma on Thursday near the church, bleeding from the chest and told him, "I did it on purpose," King said.

Utility workers were still clearing severed electric wires at the crash scene while police directed motorists around the area when Fernando Gersberg, 19, drove through the intersection.

That's when Curtis J. Peppers, 32, came along in a truck.

An officer yelled in vain for Peppers to stop before the truck hit Gersberg's car, killing the teen-ager.

U.S. condemns Indian nuclear aid to Iran

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani on Sunday condemned the United States for forcing other countries not to cooperate with Tehran on nuclear projects, Iran's Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

"America has frankly and boldly announced that the Islamic Republic of Iran has no right to use nuclear technology even for non-military goals," Rafsanjani said.

The agency quoted him as saying the United States was openly pressing and threatening countries such as China and India.

He referred to the big powers as "monopolizing and impudent parties."

On Friday, State Department deputy spokesman Richard Boucher said the United States had asked India not to go ahead with a reported plan to supply a nuclear research reactor to Iran.

Booth serves campus visitors

Ed Carney is the man behind the glass. He has served K-State in the information booth for the last 12 years. Carney spends most of his day answering questions, selling parking permits and chasing away parking violators in the K-State Union's two parking lots.

Ed Carney enjoys helping people, averages 200 information requests daily

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Ed Carney watches from the K-State Information Booth as a red Toyota stops in front of the K-State Union parking stall he has blocked off with an orange cone.

"They will think about getting out, moving it and parking there. You think they would realize why that cone is there," he said.

This time, the two men in the car do, and they drive on, leaving Carney pleased.

"Usually, the kids just run over the cone and park. Then I have to tell them that the space is reserved and show them the cone under their car so they believe me," he said.

This is one of Carney's various duties, which include reserving parking stalls for visiting VIPs and companies, and directing visitors to different buildings. He has worked in the information booth for 12 years and has become an unofficial greeter for K-State.

"I represent K-State to visitors. I'm the first one they see, so I have to look my best," he said.

Carney said he has an average of 200 people stop by the booth each day, and about 95 percent of those are looking for Anderson Hall.

"You just need common sense for this job. I'm here to help," he said. Occasionally, a lost and confused student needs that help.

"Kids have a lot of things on their minds. I try and make them feel relaxed and help them out," he said.

Carney said he tries to stay relaxed in his booth, which is only 9 feet long and 3 feet wide.

The booth is heated and air conditioned. Carney has also added a coffeemaker and passes time by listening to classical piano tapes.

With so many people coming by each day to ask something, he said he never feels isolated in his small surroundings.

"How can you get lonely with 20,000 kids running around?" he said.

Carney said he enjoys his job, but the student parking enforcement officers who relieve him for lunch said they don't think they could share in his enthusiasm if they had to spend eight hours in the booth each day like he does.

Student officers' last names are not used, because their supervisor said he was concerned about retaliation against them, since they often hand out parking tickets.

Ron, sophomore in information systems, said he is amazed at how Carney can spend so much time in the booth each day.

"I don't think I could handle eight hours in it," he said.

Willie, senior in park and recreation administration, agrees.

"One hour gives me time to relax, but I wouldn't like it for eight hours. That's too long to be confined in one place."

Carney said he enjoys every visitor who stops for his assistance.

"I don't get bored. I get to know people from different parts of the state."

Campus repair a constant job for University

Painting, upkeep top priorities of departments

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Keeping things up on campus is a constant battle.

Small staffs, limited funding and a great deal of time and labor are the opponents the housing department, Division of Facilities and the grounds department face.

Painting, building maintenance and the upkeep of the University's lawns are the top priorities.

The housing department is responsible for painting 1.5 million square feet with a staff of 10.

The housing staff paints the residence halls, Jardine Terrace and other buildings that fall within the department's control. Housing's goal is to paint everything once every five years, so painting is scheduled on a five-year cycle.

"If there is a major problem or something is bad, arrangements can be made to get something painted," said Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent of the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

To properly paint a dorm room takes 16 man hours and requires the cooperation of the students living there.

Ninety percent of the paint used is purchased from the Lansing Penitentiary. Wiley said because the state of Kansas is responsible for making the paint, the department is asked to buy it. Some other paints such as sprays are purchased elsewhere, Wiley said.

Students wishing to have dorm rooms painted are asked to fill out a contract. If the room qualifies to be painted, students have fifteen colors to choose from.

Hallways in dorms have similar procedures, but more colors are allowed and the painting must be approved through the hall director and the housing department. Walls can be designed by the students and will be painted by the department's staff. Wiley said the staff tries to please everyone, but it is not always easy.

"Because the dorms are like transient billets, we have to work on give and take and find a pleasing middle-of-the-road choice," Wiley said.

Maintaining campus

■ The Housing and Grounds departments and the Division of Facilities all deal with small staffs and limited funding while keeping up the campus.

■ Housing maintains its own buildings, including the residence halls and Jardine Terrace.

■ Facilities is responsible for all other buildings on campus.

■ Grounds takes care of the lawns and other greenery on campus.

The Division of Facilities concentrates on the maintenance of the buildings on campus, with the exception of the housing department's buildings.

Every seven years, buildings in the commons area of campus are to be painted. Facilities has four full-time painters. Joel McGill, physical plant supervisor II, has staff members who inventory the buildings. Each building is given a priority number, and if the number of buildings needing to be painted falls within the budget, they are painted sometime within the fiscal year.

McGill said there are several different categories of rooms on campus. Each is assigned to a department. Each room is applied to a mathematical formula. For example, other than the area to be painted, the condition of chalkboards, windows, paint and lighting are taken into consideration as well as the importance of each to the setting. Lighting in a classroom is of high importance, he said.

Each aspect is then given a number in this formula, and each room is rated as good, fair or poor. The same process is completed for offices on campus. For example, it may be more important to fix the lights in a classroom before it is painted, but it may be more important to paint an office before the lighting is changed.

Depending on room usage and visibility, the offices and rooms are then prioritized, and the rooms are

People 'naive' about AIDS problem

Doctor says virus a larger problem in foreign countries

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

Kansas has been categorized as a low-moderate AIDS-infective state. Of every 100,000 people in Kansas, 5.4 people have the AIDS virus.

"People are incredibly naive about this virus," said Dr. Stan Vermund, chief of epidemiology of the AIDS division at the National Institute of Health.

Vermund spoke about the "Recent Advances in HIV/AIDS Research" in the K-State Union Little Theater Friday afternoon.

There have been 196,718 AIDS cases reported in the United States since 1981. Through September 1991, 125,169 people have died from the disease.

"Fifty percent of the people that get the HIV virus will get AIDS within the first 10 years of being infected," Vermund said. "Some HIV-infected persons have lived for 15 years with the HIV virus and have not contracted AIDS — we do not know why this is."

For every three women who contract the HIV virus through heterosexual contact, there are two men, he said.

"Because of this statistic, those of us who follow the research were not surprised by Magic Johnson coming down with the HIV virus," Vermund said.

Sixty-six percent of men with AIDS contracted the virus from homosexual contact, he said, and 51 percent of women with AIDS contracted it from drug use.

"This 51 percent is not exactly from intravenous drug use as it is from drug-addictive women trading sex for drugs with men who have been infected with the virus," Vermund said.

Will Duke's ideals live on without him?

While there is reason to celebrate David Duke's unsuccessful bid to be governor of Louisiana, there must also be the recognition that the forces which propelled him to prominence still exist.

And as long as those forces are at work, Duke will be around to exploit them as other politicians of the right wing have been doing since the early 1960s.

The former Nazi and Ku Klux Klan leader offered racism as a simple explanation and solution for America's tough economic times.

It's easy for Duke and those like him to drive wedges between races and cultures in American society.

In an age where one is taught from the moment one sits in front of a television to believe that problems are solved by a new car, a new drug or a gold credit card, accepting the panacea of unfair competition forced by a hostile government upon a people is easier than trying to understand the complexities of declining infrastructures and poor economic management.

Yet the problems which create fear of slippage into the economic underclass have more to do with consumer and government debt, transnational corporate exploitation of Third World labor markets and lack of government investment in domestic programs than the skin color of the people applying for fewer and fewer jobs.

America's economic problems have been long in coming. They will be here for a long time. And they must be faced with a clear appreciation of their true nature.

Accepting Duke and his ilk's analyses and solutions only allows Americans to evade their responsibilities to themselves and their democracy.

Perhaps Americans of the early 1990s are not unlike the Germans of the early 1930s. In that time, they were willing to offer great power to politicians explaining the Great Depression with racist theories. Perhaps all Hitler would need today is a good sound bite.

Open minds before opening mouths

Future Farmers of America members showed their disapproval of demonstrators protesting Bush administration policies Wednesday — but they went about it the wrong way.

As President Bush began to speak inside Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, a confrontation was beginning outside.

The demonstrators carried signs protesting issues such as Bush's education policies, abortion laws, AIDS research and the condition of the environment.

For more than two hours, the group of about 50 demonstrators and 200 FFA members shouted, screamed, argued and cursed.

FFA members threw pennies, knocked down posters and shredded banners.

The Kansas City Star reported one FFA member said, "I think we ought to kill them all. They're a disgrace."

One FFA member yelled for another one to hit an abortion-rights advocate.

"Is this a national faggot convention?" shouted another FFA member, according to the Star.

Individuals are supposed to learn mature leadership in FFA, but the conduct of these 200 FFA members was immature as could be.

FFA is beneficial to everyone in the nationwide farming community.

These childish acts of violence and rudeness have shed a bad light on a top-notch organization and everything and everyone associated with it, including Kansas and the Midwest.

The FFA members who behaved improperly need to rid themselves of their pig-headed, "my-way-is-the-only-way" attitudes and open their minds to all avenues of thought. They just might learn something new.

Columnist considers perils of precipitation

JASON HAMILTON

Ankle-deep in one of the soggy sections of Farrell Library the other day, I regretfully turned my attention to the matter of the weather. I've never had a warm spot in my heart for winter, and the icy death from above was not doing much to change my opinion.

My physics book continued to sit unread before me, and I gazed out at the gray, slushy wasteland. Having nothing but snow and vectors to think about, I thought about snow.

I decided snow was bad and started writing dumb poems about how snow was the root of all evil in my life.

First off, it's cold and wet. Two big strikes against snow as far as I'm concerned. Snow just doesn't have the same panache as a warm, afternoon sun.

Also, once it comes down, it's down. Sometimes it looks cool as it drifts serenely from the heavens, but we all know that it will end up plowed to the side of the road in an ugly, brown lump of ick.

Snow has a nasty habit of melting, too. While this does serve to get rid of the ugly, brown lumps of ick, it has its drawbacks. Unlike its warmer cousin, rain, snow doesn't dry up by the next day. A heavy snow can keep the ground muddy for weeks.

Of course, as the winter advances, the snow doesn't always melt. There is always that layer of snow that lasts for weeks into the spring. By spring, of course, nearly all this snow has made the twisted evolution into lumps of ick.

There tends to be a lot less outdoor activity when there is snow about. Except for insane, snow-specific sports (like skiing, sledding and stomping ugly, brown lumps of ick), outdoor games screech to a halt.

People drive like ferrets on speed when the roads are slick. At first, I thought people were just dumb and tried to drive normally. After a few hours of watching people try to get up Manhattan Avenue, I realized that just isn't true. My current theory is that the cold actually freezes solid the automotive centers of the brain.

I held my conviction that snow was the cruelest precipitation (aside from hail, sleet and household pets) until earlier today. With my column deadline looming ever nearer, all I could think about was how evil snow was.

Banging my head against my wall, trying to dispel the demon of writers' block, I dislodged a book from my shelves, and it landed on my already bruised head. Stunned by this literary wallop, it took me a moment to identify my adversary from above.

It was the complete works of Jack London. With an icy flash, I realized just how blind I had been. How could I have ever thought that snow was the greatest of all evils?

Snow is our crystalline friend! It has all sorts of things going for it. It's cold and wet, for a start. Unlike rain, however, it doesn't soak me as I trudge to class. It just gives everyone that icy, dandruff look.

Once snow comes down, it's down. It has much more of a sense of permanence than rain, which just evaporates at the drop of a hat. How can we respect precipitation that doesn't have staying power?

Snow is essential to our culture, too. Without snow, we'd never have snow cones, snowmobiles or snow shoes — three of the four cornerstones of western civilization. The fourth, of course, is beer, which is fun to drink when it's snowing outside (and most other times, too.)

Without snow, all our Christmas classics would be silly. "It's a Wonderful Life" just wouldn't be the same with Jimmy Stewart in a tank top and jogger shorts, sweating like a pig under the August sun.

Some people will no doubt tell me snow isn't an important issue. They would, I bet, much rather discuss the political implications of, say, wind.

Open your eyes, my friends! Snow is it. It's cool, it's the weather to be in! Snow is light and fluffy, like this column.

It doesn't affect my driving, because I don't have a car. And it has no chance in heck of offending anyone, which is always a priority in my writing.

So just enjoy the snow as it drifts into your life. You might as well. You can't do anything about it.

Minor program no minor issue

Editor,

I am writing to address an issue that has long plagued the campus of K-State — the lack of an academic minor program at our University. Only a handful of students are aware that K-State is the only Big Eight university that does not offer an academic minor program.

The issue has come before Student Senate several times in recent years. The Senate has also recommended and supported a minor program several times in the past. However, the problem rests not with the Student Senate but with the Faculty Senate. Faculty Senate is responsible for all issues pertaining to academics. It is the Faculty Senate that has neglected this issue in the past.

The issue has again reached Student Senate and is expected to pass. Hopefully, from here it will steamroll into Faculty Senate, and the faculty will receive their wake-up call from the students and establish an academic minor program. It is both a needed and wanted program by the students.

Regressive sales tax taps wrong people

Editor,

I value living in a university town but think a regressive sales tax is not an appropriate mechanism for raising this money. People who use a facility should be the ones who pay for it.

As a family, we're priced out of participating in many of K-State's offerings. Some years ago, there was talk of a Manhattan YMCA, but apparently the University was concerned it would compete directly with its Rec Complex. So the public has no access to a swimming pool for nine months of the year. Permits for the natatorium or the Rec Complex are out of range for most of us who aren't connected with the University.

The various sporting events, McCain Auditorium programs and many of the community education programs — such as the summer magnet school offered by K-State — are equally out of reach for a large portion of Manhattan's families.

If Manhattan levies a general sales tax in support of the University, then K-State should use this money for general community scholarships or lower the cost threshold for public participation. The other recourse would be to choose a less regressive funding mechanism such as a luxury or an intangibles tax to pay for K-State's support.

Thanks, Jason, we needed that

Editor,

Oh, my! Jason seems to have stuck his foot in it this time. By giving us his opinion, he has offended our sensibilities. All I have to say about Mr. Hamilton's insensitive handling of the issue is, "Do it again." It makes people think. Unfortunately, not everyone shares my opinion.

Ms. Kalidova, your accusations of Jason being apathetic aren't serious, are they? Jason gives us his opinions for consideration at least once a week and probably has more real effect on the student body than all of student government combined. How about a criticism, instead of Jason, of all who either didn't care enough to vote or to find out about the candidates' stands and voted for the one that had more campaign banners. In an age when one must be truly rich to achieve public office, it is fitting that the candidate who spends the most gets the most votes.

Now, Ms. Colson, when you state that Jason plasters his opinion all over the Collegian, you are exactly right. Of course, the fact that that's what he gets paid for should weigh on judgment.

Ms. Colson, I don't think you need to attack Jason's ability and character in your rebuttal, so I won't open up on you with dozens of responses I have to every bubble-headed argument you make in your "slimy" little letter.

It's too bad that in an election that should have been about issues, the fallout, as well as the election, is based on nothing substantive. This has become a truly political process, and that disturbs me.

Designated speech zones non-existent

Editor,

While preparing a speech about the free-speech area, I came across what to me appears to be a mistake in the Sept. 5 issue of the Collegian. After talking to K-State Union Director Jack Sills, there seems to be a misunderstanding with one sentence under the title "K-State Union Information Tables."

That one sentence reads, "Free-speech areas are on the island north of the Union and in the area east of Farrell Library." In context, it appears this section was a summary of the Policy No-B-8 scheduling tables in the Union main lobby. However, after examining the actual policy, I discovered there was no mention of a free-speech area.

I called Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, and found out there are no designated free-speech areas for students on campus. She said they do not exist. The areas — island north of the Union, east of Farrell Library and east of Calvin Hall — are for off-campus organizations that want to interact with the student body.

Students are not restricted to any certain area of campus when they demonstrate. The only thing students must do is let Student Activities know where and when a demonstration will take place.

"This rule exists so demonstrations do not interfere with classes," Routson said.

One sentence in the Sept. 5 edition clouded my views on what the free-speech area really was. Although I respect the Collegian for having the guts to print a lot of stories many papers wouldn't even consider, I was let down by the lack of research done by the Collegian staff on this particular issue.

four times more lives, but AIDS research will get 19 times more money ($1.9 billion), according to the McCall's article.

Sten Vermund, chief of epidemiology, Division of AIDS, National Institutes of Health, Bethesda, Md., said he does not like this comparison.

"We shouldn't start pitting ourselves one research against another," he said. "AIDS is such a broad discipline based in the social fabric of the United States that to naively say we are putting so much money into AIDS research is not to understand what AIDS is.

"I don't think it's a matter of spending too much for AIDS and not enough for breast cancer," Vermund said. "We are spending too little on women's health."

"We should be increasing our funding for breast cancer research, and we should be increasing our funding for women and AIDS," he said. "There is a generic problem in this country that biomedical research is seen as a fairly low priority. The higher budget of the National Institutes of Health is $8.5 billion, which is the cost of ten Stealth bombers."

"We are learning things about AIDS that are extremely important for cancer and other disciplines," he said.

Vermund said AIDS research is not necessarily a study of AIDS patients but goes into fundamental chemistry of agents that might be useful anti-cancer drugs.

He said he personally believes breast cancer has been a neglected research object in the United States. Comparing the years of life lost, however, through one or another, AIDS ranks higher on the priority list, because it mainly affects young women, whereas breast cancer is likely a disease of older women.

Barry said women over the age of 50 have the highest risk of getting breast cancer because many tumors are related to low levels of estrogen, the female sex hormone. Estrogen levels decrease during menopause.

Young women who get breast cancer are particularly affected because they are likely to develop cancer in both breasts.

"Thirteen percent of breast cancer victims before menopause developed cancer in the other breast," wrote Dr. Felicia Stewart in her book, "Understanding Your Body." She said only 4 percent of post-menopausal breast cancer victims were diagnosed positive a second time.

Breast feeding seems to reduce the cancer risk. Studies have shown that women without children, women who gave birth late in life or did not breast feed developed cancer more often, Barry said.

Breast exam helps early detection

Lumps, change in nipple position often first warning signs of cancer

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

Routine breast examination is helpful in detecting the early stages of breast cancer.

Women who take birth control pills should examine their breasts on the first day of every new pack of pills.

Hormonal changes caused by the pills can provoke a swelling of the breasts, which hampers diagnosis of breast cancer.

For women who do not take birth control pills, the first day after the monthly period is the best time to test for lumps, said Catherine Barry, Women's Clinic supervisor at Lafene Health Center.

Cancer warning signs to look for are lumps in the breasts, under the arm or above the collarbone. Women should watch for abnormal changes in the nipple area — persistent skin rash, flaking, eruption or sudden changes in the nipple position and invasion, for instance.

Nipple discharge and sensations of dimpling, pulling or retraction in one area of the breast indicate something may be wrong and should be examined by a clinician.

If the physician finds a lump, he or she immediately sends for a mammogram.

A mammogram is an X-ray photograph or radiograph of the breast that are done only in hospitals. They can detect tumors much earlier than a palpation exam.

American Cancer Society guidelines advise women to have a baseline mammogram at the age of 35, said Pat Bidwell, registered radio technologist at the Saint Mary Hospital.

Women over the age of 50 should have a breast X-ray every year. For women between the ages 40 and 49, a mammogram every two years suffices, depending on the physician's judgment.

If a physician detects a lump, he or she usually assigns a follow-up phonogram to see if the tumor found is benign or malignant, said Anne Wigglesworth, Manhattan gynecologist.

Phonograms, with the help of ultrahigh frequency sound waves, can detect if the tumor is a fluid-filled cyst or a solid mass.

Bidwell said phonograms are also used to diagnose cancer in pregnant women because exposure to radiation early in pregnancy could harm the fetus.

A mammogram costs about $60, and phonograms average $160.

Legislation now requires Medicare to pay for mammography if a disease state is present, Wigglesworth said.

She said a new legal policy that took effect in Kansas last year requires insurance to pay also for preventive mammography.

Soldier dies in gunfight at Alibi Tavern

Man in custody in Junction City following shooting

ERIN BURKE
Staff Writer

An exchange of gunfire between two Fort Riley soldiers brought Junction City Police to the Alibi Tavern, 1322 Grant Ave., around 2 a.m. Friday.

A verbal argument between Pvt. 1st Class Richard L. Tapscott and Sgt. Marvin K. Guydon began in the parking lot outside the Alibi, said a Junction City police officer who asked not to be identified. The argument escalated into a gunfight, resulting in several shots being fired.

Tapscott was shot once in the chest and was pronounced dead upon arrival at 2:45 a.m. at Irwin Army Hospital, Fort Riley, said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer.

The police chased Guydon, but were unsuccessful after he fled the scene of the crime, the officer said.

"I don't know if he knew the guy had died, but he later turned himself in," the officer said.

Guydon is now in custody of the Junction City police on the charge of second-degree murder. The bond is set at $75,000, the officer said.

Gypsy
Saturday, November 23, 8 p.m.
The memoirs of stripper Gypsy Rose Lee suggested this fable of a steamrolling stage mother who, in Kenneth Tynan's words "was forever pressing her children's noses to the grindstone of her own frustrated ambitions." Gypsy will transport you to the tough and sleazy world of vaudeville through the magic of a Broadway musical in the grand tradition. Arthur Laurents' book is first-rate, Stephen Sondheim's lyrics are right on the mark, and Julie Styne's score is his finest. So, as Rose's daughters would have put it, "Let us entertain you!"

"Best damn musical I've seen in years."

Coaches are spooky

Coaches are scary people. They've got mystical powers that are hard to understand.

K-State's Bill Snyder is one of those spooky people. Brigham Young's Lavell Edwards is another. First, there's Snyder. He has the Wildcats brainwashed. He admitted it Saturday.

"We certainly can't control the weather, but we can control our players' attitudes about it," Snyder said.

Doo-dee doo-dee doo-dee doo-dee. Can't you hear that music from the Twilight Zone in the distance? Last year's Big Eight coach of the year is into mind control.

Gee. Never knew Dr. Frankenstein's lab was on Kimball Avenue. Snyder and his staff are out there creating a blizzard- and monsoon-crushing monster.

This isn't a new thing, either. Remember the K-State hurricane that blew away the Cyclones last season in Manhattan? It poured and poured, as the Cats beat Iowa State 28-14.

"I told our players before that game that whoever had the toughest quarterback was going to win that game," Snyder said. "We had Carl Straw, and there wasn't a tougher human being on the face of this earth than Carl Straw. Our players truly believed that."

Maybe that's why the Cats' game with Nebraska has been moved to Tokyo next season. The Cornhuskers must be worried about a December game with the Cats in the unpredictable Kansas climate.

K-State's players might agree.

"It seems like the more it snows, the better we play," linebacker Brooks Barta said after K-State's 28-7 loss at Oklahoma Nov. 2.

It's true. Before a blustery wind brought in a light snow, Oklahoma built a 21-0 lead. While it snowed, the Cats played the Sooners even.

That invincible attitude was present again Saturday after K-State put the finishing touches on Missouri.

"I rather like these conditions," Snyder said. "The weather is a state of mind."

The strange work of Snyder is applied to a good cause — making his team believe it can win. The same can't be said for Edwards, whose Cougars celebrated something hardly worth being proud of Saturday night after their game with San Diego State.

San Diego State exploded to a 45-17 lead in the third quarter, but the Cougars started to close the gap. The Aztecs' lead was cut to 52-45 when BYU's offense took the field with less than two minutes remaining.

The Cougars marched down the field and scored a touchdown with less than a minute to go, when Edwards sent his placekicker on to the field to attempt to tie the game.

The scenario was simple. If BYU escaped the game with a tie, it would assure itself of a WAC championship and represent the league in the Holiday Bowl next month.

The same thing would apply for a win. The Cougars made the extra point, and the game ended in a 52-52 deadlock.

What was truly amazing was the jubilation shown by BYU players at the end of the game. In a competitive game where the object is to score more points than the other team, the Cougars appeared extremely satisfied with the tie.

Edwards must have some mysterious power to be able to sell that kind of outcome to his team.

In contrast, Snyder said he told the Cats' offensive players that they would attempt a two-point conversion when they scored a last-minute touchdown at Nebraska last month. Notice the key words in the previous sentence — when they scored.

Confident brainwashing makes Snyder a friendly spook. Like Casper the Friendly Ghost.

Cats rip Tigers for 6th win

K-State guaranteed to break .500 for 1st time since bowl season

TODD FERTIG Sports Writer

Futility U. just became a thing of Sports Illustrated history.

After winning 11 football games in the past two years, the K-State Wildcats finally became winners.

By trouncing Missouri 32-0 Saturday, the Cats secured their first winning season since 1982, raising their record to 6-4. Of the firsts accomplished by K-State since Bill Snyder assumed the head coaching job three seasons ago, he said this one was the biggest.

"It was extremely important for us. It's that next step," Snyder said of establishing a winning record. "It means so much to these young kids, especially for these seniors, because it's something they've never experienced here. It meant a lot to them, and they didn't take it lightly."

"I think the foundation was laid two years ago and we've built on that. Every time you do something decent, you're taking another step. But this helps all aspects of our program."

K-State raced past Missouri on the rain-soaked turf, piling up 26 points in the second quarter. The Tigers battled the elements throughout the game. The Cats ignored them. Missouri fumbled a team-record 11 times, two of which turned into second-quarter K-State touchdowns.

After battling the Cats to a standoff in the first period, the Tigers stubbornly allowed K-State to score, then handed the Cats another touchdown. Quarterback Paul Watson put the first score on the board, picking his way around the right end for a two-yard touchdown run.

Missouri then coughed up the ensuing kickoff, returning the ball to the Cats on the MU 24. After Michael Smith took in a Watson pass in the flat and fought for a 16-yard gain, Eric Gallon took a pitch around the right and into the end zone.

Gallon helped the Wildcats overcome inconsistencies in its passing attack, rushing 35 times for 184 yards. Gallon accounted for nearly half of K-State's total offense, and took most of the team's handoffs until Snyder removed the starters in the fourth period.

"Missouri has had some problems stopping the rush this year," Watson said. "We figured if we could get Eric open and break a couple of runs, we could start throwing the ball a little bit. He let us start completing some passes, and then they didn't know what to expect."

Gallon set up a third touchdown just minutes later. Running the same play that he scored on earlier, Gallon skirted the right end and ran 19 yards to the K-State 48. One play later, Watson floated a pass for Gallon, who was paced stride-for-stride down the sideline by Tiger defensive back Jermaine Wilkins. Both players leaped for the underthrown pass, which deflected off the pair's fingertips and Wilkins' shoulder pads.

Gallon pulled it in and raced down the sideline before being knocked out of bounds at MU's 4.

"That catch was something I can't describe," Gallon said. "We just both went up and I tipped it, and then neither of us knew where it was until I somehow came down with it."

After going scoreless in the first 18 minutes of the game, the Cats posted 20 points in just 4:30. The Tigers tried to regroup, entering K-State territory with the clock winding down. The threat was stopped by a sack of Tiger quarterback Phil Johnson by Laird Veatch on third-and-one.

K-State regained possession, and with 17 seconds left in the half, Watson spotted Russ Campbell wide open over the middle, and the tight end hauled in a pass and blasted his way to the 15. Snyder sent placekicker Tate Wright onto the field for a last second field goal. Not satisfied with a 20-0 advantage, however, Snyder called for a fake that caught Missouri sleeping.

Watson pulled up after taking the snap to find Campbell completely unnoticed by the Tigers. Campbell took the pass and walked into the end zone with one second remaining.

The explosion of the second quarter, however, was overshadowed by the consistent play of the defense, which recorded K-State's first shutout since 1975.

"Our defense really set the tone," Snyder said. "Missouri has got some weapons and they've got some people who can strike from anywhere on the field, and when you blank those guys, you've done something."

The Missouri offense, which averaged 357.8 yards in its first nine contests, managed just 260 Saturday. The Tigers entered K-State territory just four times.

Mistakes doom Chiefs

Broncos win, lead AFC West

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Steve DeBerg shook his head and wondered why he had such a miserable day. Charles Dimry of the first-place Denver Broncos may know.

"The coaches put the defense in," said Dimry, who made one of four interceptions of DeBerg and returned it for the clinching touchdown Sunday in a 24-20 victory over Kansas City. "I was just in the right place at the right time. It was just good strategy."

Proving the interception is mightier than the sack, the Broncos (8-3) seized sole possession of first place in the AFC West despite an aroused defense that sacked John Elway six times.

The Broncos, who beat the Chiefs 19-16 in Denver last month, scored two touchdowns 59 seconds apart in the third period en route to their 11th victory in their last 17 meetings with Kansas City.

"It's difficult to execute offensively on the road, because the crowd is into it, and you can't hear anything," Denver coach Dan Reeves said. "The defense has to come up with some plays. It was a big game for us, because we could stay in first place and win on the road. Everybody was emotionally high."

DeBerg, who had only four interceptions all last year, was replaced in the fourth period by Mark Vlasic, who threw an 8-yard touchdown pass to Tim Barnett.

"It's been about 2 1/2 years since I struggled through a game like I did today," said DeBerg, who also overthrew several wide-open receivers. "I just didn't play well. I don't know why."

The Chiefs (7-4) had the ball on the 50 with 54 seconds remaining, but got off only two more plays, partly as a result of an inadvertent error by officials. With 35 seconds left, the Chiefs got an injury timeout. The rule says when a team is tied or trailing and has exhausted its timeouts, then 10 seconds must be run off the clock if time is called for an injury to one of the team's players.

But officials did not know the timekeeper had already run the clock from :35 to :25, and referee Bob McElwee ordered another 10 seconds off.

"When I got back out to the center of the field after talking with (Chiefs) coach (Marty) Schottenheimer, the clock was at :25," McElwee said. "As our procedures call for, (it's) 10 seconds before the quarterback can snap the ball. I instructed him that I would wind the clock behind him and at 16 seconds, he could snap it. I started my rundown from :25."

Told it appeared there had been a miscommunication among the crew, McElwee said. "It appears."

"Officiating did not beat us," Schottenheimer said. "We gave up a couple of big plays defensively and turned the ball over on offense, and if you do that against a good team, the officiating doesn't make any difference."

Gaston Green rushed for 130 yards, including a 60-yard sprint for the Broncos' only touchdown of the first

Men's golf team takes top lineup into Jaguar Classic

ERIC BROWN Sports Writer

The adage "saving the best for last" could apply when the K-State men's golf team begins play today at the Jaguar Classic in Augusta, Ga.

The Wildcats will be represented by players who were expected to lead the team all season. Seniors Bill Graham and Brett Vuillemin, juniors Richard Laing and Jim Brenneman and sophomore David Sedlock made the trip.

"This will be the first time all season that we will be taking our top five players," Coach Mark Elliott said. "Through the fall, they are the top five players statistically as well. Yet this is one of the few times they've all been together."

The reason for constant changes in tournament lineups this fall was the use of qualifying rounds for each meet. Elliott said the pre-tournament battles

Trio leads Cats to 2nd; Trask qualifies for men

DAVID SVOBODA Sports Writer

For the members of one K-State cross country squad, Saturday was a day they'll long remember.

For the other team, however, it was a day they'd just as soon forget.

The Wildcat women finished second at the Region V meet at the RAFT Golf Course outside of Augusta, qualifying for a trip to the national meet Nov. 25 in Tucson, Ariz.

But the men finished a disappointing third, a full 52 points behind second-place KU. The top two teams in each regional race qualify for the national meet.

"You have to give our women credit," K-State coach John Capriotti said of his team, which finished 40 points off of Nebraska's winning mark. "They went out and ran hard in this meet and really took it to them."

"It was really even close, at one point, between us and Nebraska for the championship. We kind of faded late, though."

One of K-State's men failed to fade, and thus qualified for nationals individually. Todd Trask was the sixth overall finisher and will make the trip to Tucson and continue to pursue his dream of becoming an All-American.

"Todd's goals haven't changed," Capriotti said. "He wants No. 1 to be an All-American and No. 2 to be the top American finisher. There were a lot of good individuals in our region."

"The competition there is just about as strong, individually as it will be anywhere in the country."

Though Trask garnered the spotlight for the men, the whole women's team will travel to Tucson.

K-State's second-place team performance was made possible in large part by the efforts of Janet Treiber, Paulette Staats and Jeanene Rugan.

The trio finished seventh, 10th and 11th individually, pacing the team to its third straight national berth and eighth in 10 years.

Capriotti said the achievement of the women was made more remarkable by the absence of Janet Haskin — arguably the team's top performer heading into the year — because of leg troubles that led to a redshirt year.

"There are not a lot of programs that can take the No. 1 girl out and still go to nationals," Capriotti said. "That's a testament to our girls."

Joining Treiber, Staats and Rugan in scoring for K-State in the women's race were Martha Pinto (27th) and Renee Russell (30th). Both were capable of better, Capriotti said.

Pinto was in the top 15 much of the race, and Russell had been one of the team's top three runners prior to the Big Eight meet.

"People probably didn't recognize where Martha was when she hit the chute at the end of the race," Capriotti said. "But she almost faded too much."

"And if we can get Renee back to where she was, with Rugan going strong again, we can do some nice things at nationals."

On the men's side, nice things were harder to come by. Iowa State, as Cats better this time

Running game gets going in 111-90 win

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

What a difference a week makes. The men's basketball team, having looked sluggish in a win over the Ukraine National Team Nov. 7, looked anything but Friday and ripped the Michigan AAU squad 111-90 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Newcomer Trasel Rone led the way in the final exhibition tilt for the Cats, scoring 20 points and grabbing nine rebounds in just 19 minutes of work.

"Going into the game a week ago, we really hadn't worked on team offense," K-State coach Dana Altman said.

The week's work appeared to produce dividends, as five additional Cats joined Rone in double figures, led by Vincent Jackson's 16.

"Last week, I don't think we were prepared mentally to play the way we want to play," Jackson said. "We're all in the process of getting to know which player is going to make which move on a particular night."

That lack of familiarity was evident for a short stretch late in the first half, as K-State let a lead slip away to trail at the half by five, 51-46.

"We weren't attacking their defense," Altman said of the eight-minute span at the end of the half, which saw the defending national AAU champs with leads in the teens for much of the period. "We needed to attack them some on dribble penetration, and we weren't."

Another thing about the span that bothered Altman was K-State's defensive play. For a second straight game, the second-year coach was displeased by the K-State effort on that end.

"We just didn't get back defensively," he said. "And they had us standing straight up and down on offense and settling for jump shots."

That standing around ended in the second 20 minutes, as the Cats rolled to 65 points on strong shooting and fresh, young legs.

"We wanted to play a running style of game last week," said reserve center Darryl King, who had 12 points and eight boards. "It's just a matter of time until we get it clicking, but we were closer tonight."

King said the running the team did in the second half was just a hint of things to come.

"We wanted to run a little more than we did last season, but we just couldn't do it," he said. "But we've got a lot of thoroughbreds in the stable right now, and we're going to turn it up a notch."

As a result of the transition-style attack displayed by the Cats, 10 different players handed out assists.

K-State center Darryl King and Michigan AAU forward Gilvanni Johnson go for a loose ball Friday night in the first half of their game in Bramlage Coliseum. After a slow start, the Cats won the exhibition 111-90.

"I thought Gaylon Nickerson played unselfishly," Altman said of his junior college transfer at point guard, who had three assists and missed on numerous others as surprised teammates dropped passes, both inside and out.

The fact that Nickerson played at all was a surprise to some. Early last week, there was some doubt as to whether he would play at all because of a foot injury, but he started and had 11 points in 26 minutes of work.

A total of 12 others joined Nickerson on the floor, and all of them scored. That depth has Ski Jones, who had 12 points, excited.

"We've got lots of talented athletes here," he said, "and it's always great to have great talent."

The question of just how talented

Bufs' comeback keeps race in air

KU's bowl hopes fade in 30-24 loss

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The situation with the Big Eight and bowl games is really very clear.

The only thing left is for the Big Eight's Big Three to go out and play their final games to settle all the ifs.

If No. 11 Nebraska beats No. 19 Oklahoma in the annual showdown Nov. 29, Nebraska goes to the Orange Bowl.

If No. 15 Colorado beats Iowa State next week and Nebraska wins, the Buffs go to the Blockbuster Bowl, and Oklahoma goes to the Gator Bowl.

What happens if everybody who is supposed to win loses?

Simple enough. The Big Eight champion, the highest-ranked team if there is a tie, goes to the Orange. Runnerup to the Blockbuster. Third-place team to the Gator.

A lot of things could have been settled were it not for an incredible 80-yard drive through a driving snowstorm in the final two minutes that gave Colorado a 30-24 victory over upset-minded KU in Boulder.

Spikers lose to Tigers to fall in last-place tie

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It was as if K-State and Missouri were playing for the Big Eight championship Saturday.

Players were diving and fighting to keep the volleyball in play.

But in reality, the teams played for nothing more than pride and hopes of avoiding the conference cellar.

The Tigers put the Wildcats in a tie for last place with a 11-15, 16-14, 14-16, 15-9, 15-10 win at Ahearn Field House. Both teams have 1-9 league records.

K-State had its chances to win the two-hour match, but the Cats' old axiom — a lack of consistency — kept it from happening.

"Missouri wanted to win more than we did," K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "We tried all season long to learn the lesson of playing consistent. We weren't able to transfer it from practice into the game. And if you're inconsistent, you really can't win a game."

After winning the first game with six kills by Kathy Saxton, K-State struggled early in the second game.

Outside hitters Stephanie Lister and Rhonda Hughes helped the Cats rally from a 14-7 deficit to tie the game, but the Tigers scored on two long rallies to win 16-14.

The next game was a reversal of the second. The Cats were ahead by six points early, but the Tigers came back for a 14-13 lead.

K-State regained the lead and won the game on the fourth set point.

Missouri dominated the fourth game to even the match.

After the Tigers took a 9-8 lead midway through the tiebreaker, they scored three quick points and eventually won the match on a smash by Melinda Wrye.

Missouri's coach Craig Sherman was pleased with his team's play.

"It was a big match for us," Missouri coach Craig Sherman said. "Our concern was to play steady, not giving up too many points in a row. We wanted to keep pressure on K-State and I think we did a really good job of that."

Wrye, with 25 kills, and Shelly Lowery, with 19 kills, put the most pressure on the Cats' defense.

Hagemeyer said the best individual performance was by senior Rhonda Hughes who had 20 kills and 23 digs in her last game in Ahearn Field House.

"Rhonda ended her home career playing really well," Hagemeyer said. "When we gave Rhonda the ball outside, it was a good ball that she could score on."

Defense posts a rarity

Players young when Cats blanked Shockers in 1975

SCOTT PASKE

K-State nose tackle Evan Simpson tried to guess the last time the Wildcats posted a shutout after Saturday's 32-0 blanking of Missouri.

"Since Adam and Eve," Simpson said. "I don't think my parents were even around."

Perhaps a slight exaggeration, but not far from the truth. The Cats yielded points in 184 consecutive games between Saturday's whitewashing and a 32-0 win over Wichita State in 1975.

"I was just running around being your typical kindergartner," junior defensive end Reggie Blackwell said. "Going to school and stuff."

For sophomore linebacker Laird Veatch, who blitzed through the middle to put a bone-jarring hit on Missouri quarterback Phil Johnson in the second quarter, memories of 1975 are captured in photo albums.

"I was only three at the time," Veatch said. "I don't remember a whole lot of anything."

It's a surprise Johnson did after Veatch's sack, which helped set up K-State's final touchdown of the first half. The Cats limited Johnson, the Big Eight leader in total offense, to 68 yards of rushing and passing.

"Whenever you get to a guy a couple of times and put some good hits on him, it's going to shake him up a little bit," Blackwell said. "We did a pretty good job of that."

In fact, K-State did a lot of things right on defense. The Cats forced a Missouri record 11 fumbles and recovered six. The defense sacked Johnson and Tiger reserve Jeff Handy four times in the game.

"It was total domination," senior defensive end Elijah Alexander said.

"I loved it."

Missouri coach Bob Stull didn't. He said the turnovers shattered any hopes the Tigers had of staying close to the Cats.

"It seemed like any time we'd break a big play, we'd turn around and fumble," Stull said. "You can't score when your doing that. When you can't score, and you're down by 26 points at halftime, then you've got real problems."

Any doubt of a shutout was erased in the game's final minute when reserve defensive end Derrick McBride pounced on Handy's fumble.

"It's a heckuva accomplishment," said Simpson, who recovered one of the Missouri fumbles. "We've come close a few times, but we've never taken that step."

"It seems like we keep doing something different every week that we haven't done before," Veatch said.

pressure, stepped across the line of scrimmage, but review officials said it was inconclusive.

"I wouldn't have thrown it if I thought I was over the line. I knew I was pretty close," Elway said. "As soon as I saw him in the end zone I got rid of it as quickly as I could."

With Denver leading 3-0 in the second quarter, Barnett turned a short pass into a 63-yard gain and Christian Okoye put the Chiefs on top 7-3 with a 7-yard run.

Four plays later, Green started right and cut back left against the flow, juking Kevin Porter and outrunning Jayce Pearson on a 60-yard touchdown romp.

DeBerg accounted for all but three yards of a 66-yard drive in the final minute of the half to set up Nick Lowery's 19-yard field goal that made it 10-10 at halftime.

German Nationals teach Lady Cats rough lesson

K-State beaten by 49 points in exhibition game

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

The K-State women's basketball team has a good understanding of why college teams play exhibition games.

The German National Team gave the Lady Cats all the reasons they needed in a 94-45 rout of K-State Friday at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We just did not play well. We played poorly," Coach Susan Yow said. "The team is disappointed. We're not a good team right now."

K-State, which played five players who weren't on the roster last season, shot 30.8 percent from the field. The Germans shot 60 percent for the game, including 65 percent in the second half.

The dominance was evident in every statistical category. German National reserves outscored the Lady Cats' substitutes 64-12. K-State was outrebounded 48-26, committed 27 turnovers and had five shots blocked.

"We're a young team, and we're learning how to be intense, but we have a long way to go," Yow said. "We'll definitely use this as a learning experience."

"But this might be the very thing we needed to put us on alert."

Despite the performance, Yow promised K-State will field a competitive team before the end of the season.

"We can become a better team, and we will become a better team. We truly will," Yow said.

The Lady Cats were led by senior point guard Mary Jo Miller, who figures with 18 points.

Leah Honeycutt, who was recently reinstated to the team, scored a team-high 13 points in 35 minutes of action. Forward Christine Pohl led six

"I was really concerned with the man-to-man defense because that's what we've been working on," Yow said.

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 expected, ran away and hid, and KU was stronger than Capriotti had anticipated.

Mike Becker finished 13th, Anthony Williams was 22nd, Ron Smith was 37th and Yared Berhane was 38th to join Trask as the K-State scorers.

"Smitty didn't run a very good race," Capriotti said of his senior, who was one of the team's top three runners early in the year. "You put him up where he belongs and we're right there."

Injuries hampered the men's team as well, with Phil Byrne forced to the sidelines much of the season.

Chiefs

"Coming into this game, our main objective was to eliminate big plays and not to turn the ball over," said a grimacing Chiefs defensive end Bill Maas.

With 4:00 remaining in the third quarter, Pete Holohan tipped DeBerg's pass into Dimry's hands at the Kansas City 26 and Dimry raced untouched into the end zone for a 24-13 lead.

A minute earlier, Elway had thrown a 29-yard touchdown pass to Mark Jackson in another controversial play. It appeared Elway, running away from

Terror reigns in 'Cape Fear'

Scorsese's new film is flawless; De Niro is beyond description

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

If you thought Travis Bickle from "Taxi Driver" was scary, then you might want to take a seat near a bathroom or an exit before getting acquainted with Robert De Niro's latest celluloid psycho.

As Max Cady, the beefed-up, tattooed and deliciously dangerous De Niro stalks every minute of Martin Scorsese's "Cape Fear," which opened nationally and — what a surprise — in Manhattan Friday.

The latest in a disturbing trend of remakes, sequels and rip-offs coming out of Hollywood, "Cape Fear" actually earns the label of tribute rather than grave-digging.

In updating the story, Scorsese takes care to at least leave the audience questioning the lines between good and evil — painting Cady as a definite player on the side of evil, but then plunking Nick Nolte and Joe Don Baker right on the fence between the two. This power play keeps the audience guessing throughout the film, even when it is obvious from the opening minutes there is going to be some wild, bloody death-battle involving De Niro before the final credits roll.

Nolte plays yuppie Southern lawyer Sam Boden, who unsuccessfully defended Cady in a rape case 14 years earlier. Bent on revenge, Cady follows Boden and his family to North Carolina after being released from a Georgia prison.

It sounds simple enough, but add to that this plot complication: Boden freely admits he suppressed evidence that might have helped Cady beat the rap. A bad boy all around, we see the married Boden flirt and carry on with another woman (who pays dearly for it in the scene that everyone is talking about), and we learn of his past infidelities.

Then, when Cady begins to stalk Boden and his family — wife played by Jessica Lange, daughter by Juliette Lewis — Boden turns first to the police. In a creepy reverberation of his role in the original, Robert Mitchum nearly and neatly advises him to blow Cady away.

Boden then turns to the sleazy, slimy, slinky private detective played by Baker, who also breaks and bends a few laws in protecting the Boden family from Cady's evil.

Lange is superb — at her best — as she pleads with the deranged Cady, intent on saving her daughter from a sure and brutal rape. Overall, Lange's role in the film is underwritten, but in the scenes where she has a little meat

MOVIE REVIEW

Cape Fear

Nick Nolte, Robert De Niro

Aside from the obvious questions (like if an ex-convict is terrorizing you, why the hell would you go to a place called "Cape Fear"?), Scorsese's latest movie is excellent.

GRADE

to chew on, she does it with style and passion.

Nolte is also good as the protector and Cady's chief opponent, but with his sullied past, the audience might be tempted to hope that the Lange and Lewis are the only survivors of the final battle.

Scorsese's direction and pacing are impeccable — this film is nearly flawless, filled with shots and scenes and moments that will haunt you for a long time. The scene in which Cady brutalizes Boden "girlfriend" — the much talked-about, cheek-biting scene — and the scene where Boden slips and falls in the detective's blood are chilling and disgusting, but memorable.

Everyone does a good job, but De Niro is unbelievable. Beyond description. It's kind of scary how effortlessly he carries these crazed, violent characters — Bickle, Al

Capone and, now, Max Cady. He is obsessed and sadistic and downright frightening, but always keeps the characters human. You can understand what makes him tick, and although it's evil and disgusting, you can never look away.

"Cape Fear" is a wonderfully satisfying exercise in terror — a film that will most certainly elevate a few hearts in the theater.

The really scary thing about these Scorsese-De Niro collaborations, however, is that terror, those pictures and the psychosis stays with you after you leave the theater.

"Cape Fear" offers some pretty scary pictures to carry away — you'll be seeing echoes of Max Cady in every greasy-haired, badly-dressed stranger for a long time to come.

A new persona hits the airwaves

Area Top-40 radio undergoes refreshing change

HEATHER ANDERSON

Oh the times, they are a changin' — even on Top-40 radio.

Every few years, a previously alternative genre of music is uprooted and often unwillingly transplanted into the Christmas-tree farm of popular music. The definition of what is normal and what is cutting edge shifts.

And it is happening again.

But first, let's backtrack for history's sake and clarification.

We only need to retreat five years to remember a new "heavy metal" band that brought its different sound to popular music. In 1987, Guns N' Roses lent a sense of diversity to a fluff-filled countdown.

While other artists were taping anti-drug spots for Saturday morning television, GN'R gained limited air-play with lyrics discussing drug and alcohol abuse. Now, it is expected to hear the band on such predominantly Top-40 stations as KQLA-FM 103.9 or as background music during the latest Arnold Schwarzenegger flick.

What was once somewhat unique quickly became a part of the norm. And, as happens to all successful formulas, GN'R was efficiently cloned within a matter of months.

Tough-guy, tattoo-laden groups quickly filled MTV — and so on, and so on, and so on.

The Guns N' Roses example seems superficial considering the transformation rap music has undergone during the past 10 years. Public Enemy and NWA now join Young MC on Casey's Countdown. Heck, by April, the voice of Chuck D will be played in the midst of taffeta- and tux-clad teens.

The change is again rearing its beautiful head — this time as a new persona. But this time, no particular category is a frontrunner. Instead, that which is cutting edge is preferred — a refreshing change that affects all music categories straight across the board.

Like the aforementioned rap example, popular music is beginning to

I want to thank the many students that supported me in the race for student body president. Your support was beneficial to me and to Kansas State.

The following famous quotation is why I ran and is why, even though we didn't win, we were successful.

"The real credit in life does not go to the one who stands on the sideline and points out where the strong stumble. Rather, the real credit in life goes to the one actually in the arena, whose face is marred by sweat and dust, who knows great enthusiasm and great devotion and spends himself in a worthy cause. For if they win they know the thrill of high achievement and if they fail at least they fail while daring greatly, so that in life their place will never be found with those cold and timid souls, who knew neither victory nor defeat." — T. Roosevelt case," he said. "We buy instant food. We do things the easy way at any cost. We need to get back to conservation and to conserving our resources," Burns said.

Some said in order for recycling to be a success, it must be convenient, and there must be a profit for those processing the waste.

"We've got to make recycling as easy as possible with little inconvenience," Burns said. "It's got to be as easy to recycle as it is to throw away."

Some things that discourage recycling are a shortage of drop-off points; time lost delabeling, washing and sorting containers; little or no return money; storage of recycled items; transportation; and laziness, Wilson said.

Since there is not a clear market for recycled goods, processing is not very profitable. This inhibits making recycling more convenient, Wilson said.

"We've got to change the way we think," Wilson said. "We need to quit thinking short term — of how it's inconvenient — and start thinking long term."

more accurately reflect the increasing anxiety of young America — the majority of the record- and CD-buying public.

Top-40 rap airplay has transformed from "who's in the house" to "who has a house." The Red Hot Chili Peppers play on KMKF-FM 101.5, and Nirvana spins giddily on MTV heavy rotation.

Popular is embracing a quasi-social awareness. But make no mistake: High-power corporate rock movers and shakers are not looking for a kinder, gentler industry.

Simply put, social awareness sells. It's an idea John Lennon had 20 years ago, but like many of his other ideas, it was ahead of its time.

Unfortunately, rather than doing something about the multiplying social problems in our country, one can feel like a revolutionary just by cranking PE up to cerebral-hemorrhaging decibels.

Maybe a more accurate descriptive phrase is, "The more things change, the more they stay the same."

your views doesn't taint your own message, and we won't be changing what we stand for," Black said on CNN's "Newsmaker Sunday."

Black later said Republicans would be more careful in 1992 than they were in 1988 to make sure their tactics and policies aren't construed as racially motivated.

Several buildings need re-roofing, but there are only four full-time roofers hired as well as students who take care of leaks and other problems.

"It's tough to do without money, but we are able to take care of the bare essentials — to keep the buildings dry, warm, cool and light," Watson said.

A special maintenance fund is set up with the Kansas Board of Regents, Watson said. Requests for money are sent to the Kansas Legislature.

Watson said K-State is not alone. Many other universities are also in need of funds to maintain buildings.

The grounds on the main campus are detailed and tailored by the grounds department.

Grounds mows the lawns on campus about 30 times a year, varying in the beginning and end of the growing season. Between May and July, the grass is mowed two times a week. All of the grass is kept at about three inches to ensure the health of the turf.

"The area around Anderson Hall is watched a little more closely because of the number of visitors traveling through," grounds maintenance manager Tom Lee said. Lee said ensuring the health of the grass by watering and maintaining is important in keeping the campus looking good.

Applications are now being accepted for the 1991-1992 exchanges in some very interesting places. Study for a year or a semester for the same fees as at K-State. Over 100 universities are now available in Africa, Asia, Canada, Latin America and Europe with programs for almost every discipline. Dow climbs 30 points after drop

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Stock prices sawed for several hours Monday in heavy trading following Friday's steep drop, but the market avoided another plunge and ended up posting selected gains.

ECONOMY

The Dow Jones average of 30 industrial stocks, which plummeted 120 points Friday, regained 29.52 points to close at 2,972.72.

Declining issues outnumbered advancing ones by about 4 to 3 on the New York Stock Exchange, with 727 up, 952 down and 485 unchanged.

Volume on the floor of the Big Board came to 238.17 million shares as of 4 p.m., up from 236.11 million in Friday's session.

Despite dire warnings from some experts that Friday's selloff could continue, investors held their composure Monday.

Friday's plunge in the Dow average was attributed partly to concern over a proposal in Congress to limit credit-card interest rates.

Many on Wall Street believed the plan could unsettle the banking system as it recuperates from debt problems of the 1980s. In addition, analysts said it could hurt the economy by putting a new damper on consumer spending, since banks may have to cut off all but their most creditworthy customers.

The proposal was criticized over the weekend by several government officials. On Monday, House Demo-

2 Western hostages freed

Terry Waite, Thomas Sutherland released; other 3 to be home soon

By the Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — Shiite Muslim kidnappers freed hostages Terry Waite and Thomas Sutherland on Monday, and Waite said kidnappers told him they would release the last three American hostages in Lebanon by month's end.

Waite said educators Joseph Cicippio and Alann Steen could be let go within the next five days and the third hostage, Terry Anderson, would later join them.

Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent of The Associated Press, is the longest held Western hostage. He was seized March 16, 1985. Sutherland, who spent most of his 6 1/2 imprisoned years with Anderson, said, "I couldn't have made it through captivity without him."

The two freed hostages, high-spirited and talkative, said they were celebrating their "first gulps" of fresh air and looked forward to meeting the sunshine.

The release of Sutherland, the American dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut, and Waite, a Briton who was captured while trying to negotiate freedom for the other Westerners in Lebanon, was a dramatic advance toward ending the hostage ordeal.

The United Nations has been leading diplomatic efforts to gain freedom for Western hostages in Lebanon in exchange for the release of Arab detainees held by Israel — a condition demanded by the kidnappers.

Sutherland, Waite and Anderson had been considered the most visible hostages, both because of the length of time they had been held and because of Waite's position as a special envoy of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The release of Waite, 52, and

HOSTAGES

IN THE MIDDLE EAST

- American hostage Terry Waite was released Monday after spending more than six and a half years in captivity.
- The rest of the Western hostages may be released this month.

Sutherland, 60, by the group Islamic Jihad, or Holy War, raised speculation that the Israelis may have made a commitment to free Sheik Abdul-Karim Obeid, their most valuable Shiite prisoner.

Waite said at a news conference in Damascus, Syria, that he did not have news on two Germans also held hostage. An Italian is also among Westerners missing in Lebanon.

U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar said Monday that all Western hostages should be freed by Christmas.

Waite and Sutherland were released in Beirut and driven to the Syrian capital, where they held a news conference at the Syrian Foreign Ministry.

Early Tuesday, Sutherland left for Weisbaden, Germany, for medical tests and Waite headed for a Royal Air Force base in Cyprus to spend the night before going on to Britain.

Waite and Sutherland were in high spirits. They said they had depended on each other for comfort and company, and described spending most of their captivity chained to a wall.

Waite said one captor came to tell them Monday afternoon they would be released. "He also said to me, 'We apologize for having captured you.' They recognize that now this was the wrong thing to do, that holding hostages achieves no useful, constructive purpose."

He also appealed to those "holding the people of South Lebanon, innocent

Campus needs fire improvement

Inspection leads to numerous safety concerns

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

A campus fire inspection in September has led to some changes.

Despite limited funding, the Campus Safety Task Force and the groundskeeping staff have been working to make the campus more fire-safe.

The State Fire Marshall's office gives the campus a fire inspection every year. Although the inspection is done by the state, Chuck Tannehill, a battalion chief for the Manhattan Fire Department, said the city fire department is under contract to serve the campus with fire protection.

Following the last fire inspection, the Manhattan Fire Department expressed some concerns about campus fire safety.

One area that needs improvement is the lack of availability to, or poor locations of, fire hydrants for certain campus buildings.

One example would be the hydrant located in front of Durland Hall, Tannehill said. It is right next to the curb of 17th Street, making it nearly impossible to hook up a hose to combat a fire in Durland Hall.

In addition to this problem, there has been a lack of visibility for hose hook-ups to the campus buildings because of overgrown shrubbery.

John Lambert, director of public safety and safety task force member, said the groundskeeping staff has been working on making these hookups more visible to firefighters.

Another item of concern was limited access of fire apparatuses. Fire trucks have a difficult time reaching fires in certain areas because of a lack of adequate service roads. Some are sidewalks with steam tunnels underneath. These sidewalks are not sturdy enough to support the weight of fire trucks.

To help solve this problem, the groundskeeping staff has worked on reinforcing the sidewalk stretching between Anderson and Waters Halls.

Lambert said K-State has a limited fire safety budget, which is largely used for the purchase of safety items. "We get x number of dollars to put in fire alarms, exit lights and other safety systems," he said.

Lambert also said most of this year's budget was used to put up lightning rods on buildings that didn't have them.

After the University of Kansas' Hoch Auditorium was destroyed by a fire caused by lightning, the Kansas

Tuition to go up 10 percent

Students to pay more than $900; K-State still cheaper than other colleges

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Tuition will increase by 10 percent next fall.

Spring semester's tuition is still $849.45, but the fall increase translates into about $85 more student's will have to pull out of their pockets.

Tuition students pay is composed of a flat tuition fee, decided by the Kansas Board of Regents, and student fees decided by Student Senate, said Registrar Donald Foster. While tuition is decided each year, fees can change each semester.

The regent's goal, Foster said, is to create a situation where students pay 25 percent of the tuition, and the state pays the rest. Senate determines what fees students pay by deciding the amount of funding needed for the different student services.

There was a $14.85 increase in student fees this year, Foster said. He said the fees that increased were the activity fee, the K-State Union repair fee, the general Union fee and the Recreational Services fee. A Student Publications equipment fee was also added.

Thomas Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance, said a decrease in state funding for the University coupled with K-State's tuition not being competitive with its peer institutions were the main reasons for the tuition increase.

Peer institutions, selected by the regents, are five schools that have similar characteristics, enrollments and missions. For several years, K-State's tuition has been about 10 percent lower than those of its peer institutions.

Woman's body found at fort

Black female, dead for 1 to 2 weeks, discovered by soldier

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

The body of a black woman, possibly between the ages of 18 and 25, was found around noon Sunday on Fort Riley.

An unidentified soldier found the body near Breakneck Lake in the Camp Forsyth area of the post. The identity has not been discovered, but the woman had been dead for one or two weeks.

Fort Riley Media Relations Officer Mark Meseke said, "There is no evidence of foul play such as a bullet or a knife wound."

An autopsy will be performed at the Irwin Army Community Hospital early this week to determine the cause of death.

"It will be a couple of days before she's identified. They'll probably have to go by dental records," Meseke said.

Tunnel gas leak reaches critical level

A pipe leak caused natural gas levels in underground service tunnels to reach a critical level Monday evening.

A 2-inch pipeline on the east side of the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building was shut off to bring the gas under control, said Jack Roets, battalion chief for the Manhattan Fire Department.

KPL Gas Service was called to measure the levels of gas in the ground and tunnels in the area.

No gas was detected inside nearby buildings. After tests were conducted on all sides of the building and the surrounding area, the leak was isolated to a pipe running along the east side of the building, but the exact location could not be found.

When gas levels in the tunnels reached 4 percent, it was necessary to shut off the source, Roets said. Gas levels were then monitored until the tunnels had aired out.

A level of 6 to 8 percent is considered explosive, he said. While breathing natural gas at any level is dangerous, he said, it must be diffused when the concentration reaches the critical level.

After the line was shut off, the gas was bled out of the pipe to eliminate buildup and allow the detection of any other leaks. The level was monitored until no gas was detected in the tunnels.

Roets said the area would receive extra patrols during the night to make sure no further problems developed. Some manholes also remained cracked to prevent any buildup of gas in the tunnels.

Facilities will be checking the line today to find the exact location of the leak and, if necessary, dig the line up to repair it.

The shut-off line would probably not cause disruption of classes in the buildings affected, Roets said, because the line was small and probably only supplied gas to labs. King Hall, Justin Hall and the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building are connected to the line.

The smell of natural gas was reported to the K-State Police at 5:35 p.m.

Matt Locke, junior in secondary education, reported the smell of natural gas to the campus police.

"I was walking up to Blumont Hall and smelled it," he said. "I knew it was natural gas, so I decided to call."

He said he did not know if it was anything big but thought it would probably be a good idea to let the police know.

After the campus police confirmed the smell, the fire department was called. Three fire engines responded to the call.

Deadly nerve gas leak cleaned up

NEWPORT, Ind. (AP) — A tiny drop of deadly VX nerve agent leaked from a storage tank at the Newport Army Ammunition Plant but posed no public health threat, the Army said Monday.

Experts say the nerve agent is so lethal that one drop on the skin could kill a person in three to 10 minutes.

Workers at the facility, which is about 70 miles west of Indianapolis, detected condensation Thursday during one of two weekly inspections of the one-ton, carbon-steel storage canisters that have held the aging nerve agent since 1968.

Maj. James E. Ewing, commander of the plant, said the leak was the first since the tanks were filled 23 years ago.

Libya will cooperate in Pan Am case

ROME (AP) — Libya asked for evidence Monday that two Libyans were involved in the 1988 bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270 people. It was responding to a British extradition request for the two.

Libya's Justice Ministry said it would cooperate with all the concerned legal authorities to get at the truth. It asked evidence so a magistrate could evaluate allegations in warrants for the arrest of Abdel Basset Ali Al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah on murder charges.

The United States and Britain, backed by France, say they are considering what sanctions to employ against Libya if it does not hand over the suspects. Washington declined to rule out military action.

Washington and London identify the pair as Libyan intelligence agents.

Libya denies any government involvement in the bombing of the London-to-New York flight on Dec. 21, 1988, that killed all 259 people aboard and 11 people on the ground.

Bartending 101 teaches basics

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Staff

Bartending 101, a fund raiser for the Association of College Entrepreneurs, lets students learn and attempt to mix drinks and keep the bar for a $35 fee. At one of the four class sessions at Rusty's Outback, Neal Thompson, Manhattan, makes a screaming orgasm shot.

Class used as fund raiser fun for some, job training for others

JULIE LONG
Collegian Reporter

You should always have a good head on your beer, said Marvin Peck, senior in marketing.

Peck is the bartender of the Bartending 101 class being presented by the Association of Collegiate Entrepreneurs.

Christy Jacob, sophomore in early childhood education, said ACE uses the class as a fund raiser to attend the national convention in Dallas.

Jacob said there is no age requirement for the class.

The class meets at Rusty's Outback bar. It costs $35 per person and consists of four one-hour sessions. The fee goes to cover the expense of ads, flyers, the bartender's fee and a bartending manual.

The purpose of the class is to teach the students how to mix drinks, maintenance of the bar, health regulations and customer service. The manual includes that information and drink recipes.

Several of the students said they had learned the little things that make customers come back.

"The customers may not always be right, but always make them think they are," said Audrey Patterson, junior in economics and student in the class.

Peck said he would like people to learn the basic concepts of bartending. He also said he would like to raise people's awareness drinks' ingredients.

"I enjoy doing it. I like telling people about the little stuff I learned," Peck said.

Most people said they took the class just for fun, but some felt the class would help them to get a job as a bartender.

Patterson said she works at a bar as a waitress and would like to get a job behind the bar instead of wading through the crowd.

David Chase, senior in theater, said he has wanted to take the class for quite some time.

"We've been talking about doing this for three years," Chase said. "You're here to learn something, but it's not like a lecture."

Ryan Hampl, junior in mechanical engineering technology, said he was taking the class because he has a lot of parties.

Hampl said he wants meet more women by mixing drinks because women drink more mixed drinks than men.

"As long as people mess themselves up drinking alcohol, there will be openings for bartenders," Hampl said.

Hampl called bartenders the "poor man's social worker." He said since he likes to help people with their problems tending bar would be a good job for him.

Jacob said the class began last spring and will be offered again next semester. There is no college credit given for the class.

Late-term abortions topic of discussion

Spokeswoman tells of abnormalities found during pregnancy

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

About 50 local pro-choice group members listened to stories of late-term abortions and discussed recent abortion protests Monday night as Peggy Jarman spoke at a Voices for Choice meeting in the K-State Union.

Jarman is the spokeswoman for Dr. George Tiller, a Wichita physician who performs third-trimester abortions and was the main target of this summer's protests. Tiller generally refuses interviews, so Jarman was a familiar face and voice in the media this summer.

Jarman is also founder and board member of the state Pro-Choice Action League.

Third-trimester abortions at Tiller's clinic, Women's Health Care Services, are only done when the fetus is abnormal or the mother's life is in danger, Jarman said. She discounted claims of pro-lifers that third-trimester abortions for convenience are available.

"People who receive this kind of news (about a deformed fetus) don't get it from the doctor one day and jump on the plane to Wichita the next," Jarman said.

This was only the second time she had used stories of clinic patients and showed pictures to discuss late-term procedures, she said. The Operation Rescue tactic of waving pictures of aborted fetuses encouraged her to show the other side.

Jarman told 10 stories of couples who detected fetal abnormalities through amniocentesis or sonogram near the 22nd week of a 40-week pregnancy.

The pictures showed fetuses with no brain, no abdominal wall, a collapsed skull, a tumor in the lung lining and neck and a fused neck and thorax.

These conditions were "totally incompatible with life," Jarman said.

Audience members asked if any of the fetuses had been born alive. Jarman said none had at Tiller's clinic, but his patients must sign a consent form which states that a live-born fetus would be taken to a hospital.

Tiller, however, has performed abortions of fetuses diagnosed with fatal conditions. Jarman told of a couple who came from Maryland for an abortion because their unborn child had Tay-Sachs, a disease that destroys the nervous system and usually kills its victim by age 6.

"I don't want to mislead you. There's a wide variety of abnormalities, and people approach them in different ways," Jarman said.

The number of third-trimester abortions performed at Tiller's clinic has increased from six in 1988 to about 24 this year, Jarman said. But she attributed that to a decrease in the number of physicians who perform them.

Jarman stressed that most late-term abortions occur early in the third trimester. In some of the stories she told, the abnormalities didn't show up until after the 20th week of pregnancy. And, amniocentesis results take a few weeks to come back, further delaying detection.

Tiller's practice of performing third-trimester abortions was the reason the radical pro-life group Operation Rescue blockaded and protested at three Wichita abortion clinics this summer.

Soviet food plea unanswered

Farmers lose money with delays, Glickman says

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Agriculture Secretary Edward Madigan said Monday that "constant complications" in the Soviet Union and legal questions were hampering the U.S. response to the Soviets' call for $3.5 billion in credit guarantees and food.

Farmers say the Bush administration is costing them a major sales opportunity by delaying a decision on the Soviets Union's request for $2.5 billion in credit to buy U.S. farm goods and $1 billion in humanitarian assistance.

Meeting with reporters in his office late Monday, Madigan acknowledged the criticism but said the U.S. response "has to be done correctly" and legally.

"It's just a very, very difficult situation. But it's made difficult, not because there's any lack of desire on the part of the president to move American agricultural products," Madigan said.

"It is a desire on the part of every-

Angry farmers

■ According to agriculture support groups, the failure of the Bush administration to make a decision on a Soviet request for credit to buy U.S. farm goods is taking potential sales from American agribusiness.

one involved to comply with the law, and that's very difficult to do considering the changing circumstances within the Soviet Union," he said.

But Rep. Dan Glickman, chairman of the House agriculture subcommittee on wheat, soybeans and feed grains, said it was "disgraceful" that no decision has been made, three months after the failed coup and more than one month since Madigan's return from the Soviet Union to assess its food needs.

Millionaire rallies for drug legalization

Richard Dennis to speak at Union tonight on economics of narcotics

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

A person can make millions in the drug business, but one man who made his millions legally is making drug legalization his business.

Richard Dennis had made his first million on the commodities market by the time he was 25. His successes were chronicled by The New York Times Magazine, The Wall Street Journal, Businessweek, Fortune, USA Today, Barron's and Esquire.

But he gave up the trading business, and now he spends his time rallying support for drug legalization.

"Drug laws are a barbaric relic of an idea we rejected a long time ago—that people don't have an inherent right to do what they want with their own lives as long as it doesn't directly harm another person," Dennis said in one of his essays on public policy.

Dennis will be coming to K-State to talk about his views on drug legalization. His lecture will be at 7 tonight in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

The lecture is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee and the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws.

John Towse, chairman of the Issues and Ideas Committee, said Dennis' message will be one of economics.

"Everybody thinks drugs are bad," Towse said. "I think it's good to get both sides of the story before you make a decision."

Towse said what Dennis has to say is important because the United States is spending billions of dollars fighting drugs, and the effort may not even be working.

Dennis is a Chicago native who graduated from DePaul University in 1970 with a degree in philosophy. He is currently president of New Perspectives Quarterly and the Chicago Resource Center. He is also chairman of the Advisory Board of the Drug Policy Foundation and is part owner of the Chicago White Sox.

He says he is not currently a drug user.

When Earvin "Magic" Johnson announced he was retiring from the Los Angeles Lakers because he had tested positive for the HIV virus that causes AIDS, an entire world was shocked.

Americans who were holding onto the myths that the virus is something that affects only homosexuals and intravenous drug users were forced to wake up to reality. AIDS hotlines across the country were bombarded with calls from curious Americans who now understand it can happen to anyone — even Magic.

Johnson's announcement has energized the battle against the HIV virus and AIDS. And at a time when the entire world may have seen a hero fall, Johnson has stood tall and pledged to assist in America's battle against this modern plague. He has vowed to become a spokesman for the HIV virus and to campaign for safe sex.

Johnson may have made a mistake, but through being a spokesperson for AIDS he is doing the world a world of good.

Magic has thrown out his message — the ball is now in our court, and the opponent is AIDS.

Outbreak of warts requires attention

When most of us sneeze or cough, we tend to cover our noses and mouths. Perhaps it's a reflex induced by our parents' regular reminders to do so, or perhaps we are truly hygiene-minded.

No matter. It helps prevent the spread of germs. It seems incongruous that more people make efforts to prevent colds than something more dangerous, even deadly sexually transmitted diseases.

Magic Johnson's HIV infection has brought AIDS to the forefront of public attention again, which is good. But college students shouldn't let that overshadow the booming epidemic of genital warts on our campuses.

National statistics show that about 15-25 percent of the adult population is infected with the human papilloma virus, which causes genital warts.

Lafene Health Center reports seeing 20 cases of HPV on a daily basis.

Those numbers are too high for any sexually active college student to ignore.

Unsightly warts aren't the only consequence of contracting HPV. Of the virus' 20 varieties, 13-14 have the potential to cause cancer. Eighty to 90 percent of cervical cancer in women is HPV-related.

It's not just a matter of personal health but protecting your sexual partners, too. Only 30 percent of people with HPV show any physical symptoms, so it's not safe enough to visually inspect yourself.

Protect yourself. Respect your partners. Go to Lafene and get checked for HPV.

In the meantime, remember that using condoms makes as Life is supposed to have meaning

STEFFANY CARREL

Somebody asked me once if I knew the meaning of life.

Actually, I think I've been asked that question several times before, but for some reason, it stuck in my head this time.

It was at a party a while ago. I remember that a band was playing in the background. It was probably Tuber, or some other "teen-angst-filled" band. There was a lot of beer, and so, of course, we were plenty fired up on this guy's front porch.

I thought it was amazing how such drunkenness brought out the philosophizing in all of us.

So, to keep the mood, I creased my brow, cleared my throat, and said,

"Yeah — I do."

Pretty bold, eh?

Whelp, that seeming to be my trademark and all, I didn't think much about it. But when that somebody then leaned over and said with a hiccup, "Really?" I knew I'd have to elaborate.

I cleared my throat again, and said, "Well, I know the meaning of my life."

It's not quite the same, I realized, but it seemed appropriate at the time.

"So what is the meaning of your life, Steff?" a voice from the porch swing said.

"To seek out and destroy the world's meddling and hypocritical proliferators?"

"To legalize marijuana?"

"To eliminate the nauseating and self-promoting position of tenured professors?"

"To bring about the ultimate destruction of the Republican Party?"

I chuckled at how well my friends knew me.

"No, no. Those are all exceptionally good answers," I said. "However, this time it goes a little deeper."

"First of all," I started, "I'll say that life is honestly about learning for me. I believe that there are just certain things in life you have to learn and understand before you can even think of moving on. You truly have to learn to crawl before you can run."

At this point, someone started to crawl away to the bushes to lose his liquor. I thought it was a touching moment of emphasis, and we all stifled a snuffle.

I regained control of my emotions, however, and continued.

"My most important idea though, is about how you learn. I look at it like a mixture of Carl Jung's concept of synchronicity and the idea of fate," I said.

"Think of all of the people you encounter in your life. My idea is that you're supposed to meet them. And that they're supposed to meet you. You learn something from everyone you ever cross paths with."

"Whether it be the person you talk to in the elevator or the person you spend the rest of your life with, you learn something very important," I continued. "You may not immediately see the significance, but it's there."

Positive or negative, every relationship you ever have gives you something you'll need in the future.

"What you need to remember is to really look for the things you've learned in past friendships, relationships, encounters, etc. Try to look beyond, 'Oh, well that jerk really screwed me over.' Try instead to see, 'That relationship really hurt, because I wasn't important to that guy. Next time, I'll make sure I'm not taken for granted and used.'"

"So it's all about learning, huh, Steff?"

"Yep," I answered.

"And that everything happens for a reason?"

"Yep."

"Then we were all really supposed to have met you?"

"Yep."

"And you were supposed to tell us the meaning of life tonight?"

"Yep."

"Wow, you're really cool, Steff."

I chuckled at how well my friends knew me.

twentysomething?

Nay. Call us
'target groups'

ED SKOOG

"We had compulsions that made us confuse shopping with creativity." — Douglas Coupland, Generation X: Tales for and Accelerated Culture, 1991.

Target groups, punk rock, none of your beeswax majors

I saw a whole aisle of Jheri Curl and Right On! hair products at the Dollar Store downtown. A rack of JET and related magazines stood at the end of the aisle. Crochet supplies were tucked near the counter. Discount candies were displayed under the more refined chocolate-dipped cherries. I bought a birthday present for my roommate and didn't linger after I paid. Discount stores are terrifying — the stark divisions from target group to target group are rarely so clear.

This is a nation of target groups.

The underlying agenda of the information/technology juggernaut (TV, radio, USA Today, Sony, General Motors, the Pentagon, etc.) is to get more people to buy more stuff.

And target groups have proliferated fast in the last few years. The return of the U.S. Army created a veteran target group, given easy credit for homes and new snazzy cars. The peace advocates during the war became a target group for bumper sticker outfits; war advocates were targeted by the yellow ribbon industry. Great trauma is transformed into an occasion to buy things.

Forty-ounce bottles of Olde English 800 frequent my apartment, but I feel like a traitor to my target group. O.E., NightTrain (another good one if you like loose stools), Colt 45 and their compatriots in the corner cooler are aimed at young black men, as are Newport cigarettes. Coors is aimed at middle-aged white men who watch, but never played, football.

Target groups have taken over the ground formerly occupied by the classes — upper class, lower class, working class. There is little talk of the lower class rising against anybody these days. Now one says, "President Bush has lost the Labor vote."

"Generation X" is a term the packagers of Douglas Coupland's novel would like to apply to Americans between the ages 20 and 35. But the parameters of the generation — restlessness, travel, spending — are not the boundaries of Hispanic Americans between those ages nor those of black America.

Coupland divides Generation X (so named because the generation has no identity — think Brand X, not Malcom) into further subgroups. Black holes are those people whose wardrobes are predominantly dark. Squires are married young'ns who require double-incomes to reproduce Eisenhower-era home lives. Yuppie wannabes are beeswax graduates already nostalgic for the 1980s. All subscribe to their own group's buying habits.

The nation is fractured. In the Pacific Northwest, America isn't even America. It has been rechristened Turtle Island, something I only marginally understand.

A Topeka friend, K., is in the puke for selling acid. He didn't fit into a target group except for his own. So he was targeted by the 5-0.

The Florida-Alaska-mission hills-compton express

"Percentage of Americans who say they do not watch TV: 8. Number of hours per week spent watching TV by those who say they do not watch TV: 10." — From the novel's epilogue

"OPTION PARALYSIS. The tendency, when given unlimited choices, to make none." — From Chapter 3

Emallgration

The phenomenon of Emallgration is defined as migration toward lower-tech, lower-information environments containing a lessened emphasis on consumerism. Like monks, the Anabaptists, Thoreau, and this guy I worked with in Yellowstone named Hugh, Coupland's solution for his character's anguish is for him to drop out of the society he knows.

Near the Mexican border, Andy (the main character) finds human warmth for the first time, after a "cocaine white egret" grazed his scalp. A van full of retarded children run over and hugs him to make sure he is OK. They leave, and he wonders in the narration whether he said thank you.

Sure, society might be hurt if the people who see what the problems are drop out, but hell — there is no room for love in the information age.

Classes help smokers quit

Great American Smokeout planned for Nov. 21

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

Wednesday is the kickoff for the Great American Smokeout sponsored by the American Cancer Society.

Human Resource Services is sponsoring events in November to help smokers kick the habit.

Joe Younger, manager of training and development, said there will be three different levels to help people quit smoking.

The first level, Younger said, is awareness.

There will be a table set up in the K-

State Union concourse Wednesday to distribute flyers on tobacco products.

"The purpose of the literature is to heighten people's sensitivity to the dangers of smoking," Younger said. "More than 300 people will pick up the literature, not so much for themselves, but for others."

The Great American Smokeout is the American Cancer Society's national campaign to persuade smokers to quit for 24 hours. This year's national smokeout is Thursday.

Dick Seaton, member of the board for the Riley County agency, said many people have quit for good on one of the past 15 annual smokeout days.

"The goal is to bring to the attention of the general population the need for smokers to try to quit," Seaton said.

The second level of quitting is preparation, Younger said. For smokers in that stage, there will be a workshop called the "No Nag, No Guilt, Do-It-Your-Own-Way Guide to Quitting Smoking."

The workshop will be at 1 p.m. Wednesday in Union 212.

A seven-week program called "Freedom from Smoking" is planned to help those smokers who have already committed to quitting. The American Lung Association sponsors this support group.

"They're all free to folks who are at one of those three levels," Younger said.

Legal services need to grow with times

Space, funding limit expansion, personnel to take cases to court

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

The economic feasibility of student legal services makes it a growing area, said Jo Hardesty, director of legal services for students at the University of Kansas.

The University of Nebraska recently surveyed 27 universities about student legal services. The results show that K-State ranks about in the middle as far as services available.

Diane Urban, K-State students' attorney, can advise and intervene, for example with a landlord, but cannot represent students in legal proceedings. Other schools provide more services, such as drawing up wills or suing a landlord over a bad check.

Because K-State falls in the middle range of the universities surveyed, current growth suggests that unless K-State's program grows and changes with the times it may fall behind.

Student Senate asked for reports from all the student services on campus as to what they provide, as well as what ideas they may have for change or expansion, said Sally Routsen, assistant dean of student life and Senate adviser.

Routsen said the study is still being done, but that Urban said the office could do a lot more for students.

Some of the changes being talked about are the addition of another full- and part-time attorney, separate office spaces for all attorneys and a law library to be shared by all attorneys.

Current funding and space limit the expansion of K-State's legal service.

Newly remodeled Student Governing Association offices have no room for an increased student legal service, Routsen said.

Urban said, "I think it could be done with the space we have if there were actually a commitment to doing it."

The office was housed in Holton this summer while the SGA office space was being remodeled. Some suggest permanently moving the service to Holton, but Urban said she finds that solution unsuitable.

"I think it's important that the legal service be as separate from the University as possible," she said.

If the funding and space problems can be worked out, these additions would give student legal services the time and personnel to take cases which require litigation.

"Since local merchants and landlords know that I cannot bring a suit against them, they are less likely to respond to reasonable demands," Urban said.

Corps popular job

Volunteers give 2 years to learn from other people, cultures

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Several K-State students have applied to experience "the toughest job they will ever love."

Becky Brandsberg, senior in social work, applied to the United States Peace Corps in October during an on-campus interview with a Peace Corps representative from the Kansas City area office.

"I am interested in working in developing countries. The Peace Corps is a good way to get experience in that area," Brandsberg said.

While many students are polishing their resumes and negotiating for starting salaries, Brandsberg has begun an equally competitive process to receive a nomination to volunteer two years of her life to service.

"It is a process to share my knowledge and learn from other people and cultures," Brandsberg said.

If she is nominated to become a volunteer, Brandsberg will send in references, submit to a background check and get a medical clearance in order to be considered for placement.

The Peace Corps experience has changed since its founding thirty years ago.

Unlike her peers in the 1960s, Brandsberg will be matched with an assignment according to her technical skills and according to the requests of the countries where she may be working.

"The Peace Corps has become more competitive and more technical," said Philip Lesniewski, Kansas City area recruiter.

Lesniewski said today more than 90 percent of volunteers have a college education.

"Most people think Peace Corps volunteers are barefoot bohemians, but they are actually students with high goals and aspirations."

"It is the best students that go," he said.

Lesniewski said he looks for organizational and leadership skills, flexibility and balance when he is recruiting.

"I think the biggest misconception about Peace Corps is that it will close a lot of career option doors, when in fact, I think it opens a lot," he said.

Dwayne Lively, graduate student in English, is in the process of applying for a teaching position.

"I've been interested in Peace Corps for a while. I would like to have a different experience and try something away from the United States," Lively said.

Lively could become one of the volunteers teaching English in Eastern Europe.

"I would probably teach English at the college level," Lively said.

Lesniewski said the three goals of Peace Corps are to provide technical assistance, teach people of other countries what the United States is like and promote a better understanding of people from other countries.

KU point guard Adonis Jordan has many fans, but none bigger than Jayhawk coach Roy Williams.

Praise for the junior, who guided the Hawks to the NCAA championship game last season against Duke, flows from the coach as if he were referring to former KU greats like Kevin Pritchard, Darnell Valentine and Jo Jo White.

"Adonis has improved a little bit in all areas since last season," Williams said. "He's worked so much on his shooting and has developed in so many ways."

"Last season I challenged him to be the best point guard in the Big Eight, and he was a little unsure of himself. This year, he's so much more confident than he was last season. He's beginning to believe in himself instead of listening to me brag on him all the time."

Williams does not hesitate to compare Jordan to the best point guards in the nation and is calling upon him to carry even more of the load this season. With big men Mark Randall and Mike Maddox, and backcourt mate Terry Brown lost to graduation, Jordan must increase his scoring average and create more offense this season, Williams said.

Jordan has proven himself as a steady point man the past two seasons. He dished out 154 assists last season, the seventh highest total in KU history. He also shot better than 50 percent from the field and finished seventh in the conference in 3-point shooting en route to averaging 12.5 points per contest.

William's expectations, however, are not based entirely on what Jordan has shown in his two seasons of action with the Hawks. Williams is more impressed with the capabilities he said Jordan displayed during the off-season.

Williams, after all, watched from the sidelines as Jordan led the gold-medal winning U.S. team in the World University Games last summer. Jordan split time with Duke's Bobby Hurley at the point and averaged 7.3 points and 2.5 assists per game. The international experience and individual practice time Jordan received has Williams expecting dramatic improvement.

Jordan earned KU's honor as the team's most improved player last season. He progressed from a steady backup and member of the conference all-freshman team to join Anthony Peeler of Missouri as the only guards placed on all-Big Eight teams. To hear Williams' outlook for the upcoming season, Jordan would have to be a favorite to repeat as KU's most improved player.

Jordan might agree. "Playing on the international team was a great experience that helped me improve so much," Jordan said. "Playing with great players every day and working on my individual skills all summer. It was great for me as a player."

This year, Jordan made everyone's preseason Big Eight first team, and looks to receive national recognition. To Jordan, however, honors are only a byproduct of a successful season.

"I will probably have to shoot a little more and step up to provide the leadership that the seniors provided last year," Jordan said. "But we've got some real good guys and I won't have much extra pressure on me."

Several relatively untested guards will run with Jordan in hopes of filling the vacancy left by Brown. Rex Walters, a transfer from Northwestern, joins the Hawks as a junior and looks to be the starter at the shooting guard spot.

Another long range bomber, 6-8 sophomore Patrick Richey will work some at the guard spot.

Tour helpful to Germans

National team

One would have expected the German National Team to be a bit tired when it played K-State Friday in Bramlage Coliseum.

But in its sixth game in eight days on a Midwest tour, the Germans were fresh enough to crush the Lady Cats 94-45 in an exhibition game.

There was little time for celebrating the team's biggest win in six contests. The Germans left for Kansas City, Mo., during the first half of the K-State men's exhibition game with Michigan AAU for a flight to Colorado.

After playing Colorado, Colorado State and Wyoming to complete the tour, the Nationals will return to Germany today.

German National Team coach Achim Kuczmanski said there was little time for sightseeing.

"We came over to the United States to play many games against American teams," Kuczmanski said. "We are playing nine games in 12 days to get experience."

Kuczmanski said the games are good preparation for a qualifying tournament that Germany has to play in next May in Finland to advance to the European Championship.

"Nine games in 12 days are a good test for us," he said. "At the qualification round, we have to play five games in five days. Because of that, we couldn't have gotten a better opportunity than to play here in the States. I am happy we've got the games. It also helps to strengthen the team itself."

Even though circumstances are sometimes stressful for the team, Kuczmanski said the coaches are glad to have the team together. Most of the players come from teams in German leagues.

"It is the first and last time the squad is together more than a weekend before the qualification preparation," Kuczmanski said. "The players came out of the league games to meet at the airport, and they'll play again for their teams when they step out of the plane."

Kuczmanski said the players, who are all students or employees, enjoy the games in the States.

"It is a great atmosphere here at the games," he said. "The show around the game is very nice. It is much more fun to play here than in Europe."

In the first two games, the players had some trouble becoming familiar with college rules. The biggest change for the team was to play with a smaller ball. In Europe, women's teams play with the bigger men's ball.

Because the game is more aggressive on the college level, and players spend most of their time practicing in Germany, Kuczmanski wanted to expose his players to the U.S. style of play.

Two of Kuczmanski's players who did not make the trip played four seasons at Oregon State. Tours like the Germans' current one have helped players pursue playing careers in the United States.

Christine Pohl and Ute Kratschmann at age 19 are the two youngest German players. The tour was the pair's first with the national squad, but their abilities have impressed U.S. coaches.

Stepping forward

KU junior Adonis Jordan will be expected to provide added scoring for the Jayhawks this season. Jordan, a second-team all-Big Eight performer last year, led the Hawks in minutes played and posted the seventh most assists by a KU player in a season with 154.

For the second straight tournament, the Wildcat golfers have posted a first-round score that has left them in position to battle for an upper-division finish.

K-State tied its second-best round of the fall season with a 4-man team score of 303 on Monday at the Jaguar Classic in Augusta, Ga. The Cats enter today's final round in eighth place — 12 strokes from the top spot.

Today's final round will be 18 holes. "We had an OK round. Not horrible, but not great," Coach Mark Elliott said. "Every time out you think you could have done better."

"It's important that we play well, because this is our last round of the fall. We need to go out feeling better."

The Cats were paced by junior Jim Brenneman, who is tied for ninth after shooting a first-round 73.

"That was a good score for Jim," Elliott said of the performance of Brenneman, who failed to qualify for the last tournament. "It's good to see that. He had lost confidence, but he's got to feel better about himself now."

Another bright spot was from the squad's other junior, Richard Laing. Laing shot one of the team's best rounds of the season, only to receive a two-stroke penalty for playing the wrong ball, Elliott said. He finished with a 74, which placed him in a tie for 15th place.

While the Cats are a dozen strokes from first, they are only seven strokes from second and four shots from fifth. "Last year at this tournament, we

Redskins rolling along

Rypien's play puts Washington in NFL playoffs

By the Associated Press

HERNDON, Va. — Don't look now, but the guy Washington Redskins fans feared was a poor quarterback is now the NFL's second-best passer.

Mark Rypien threw for two touchdowns and completed 21 of 28 passes for 325 yards in Sunday's 41-14 victory over the Pittsburgh Steelers, and moved past the injured Steve Young of San Francisco into the top spot among NFL quarterbacks. His 100.1 rating trails only Buffalo's Jim Kelly.

Coach Joe Gibbs said Rypien is playing better than he ever has as the Redskins remain unbeaten after 11 games.

"I think we've got a real hot quarterback," Gibbs said Monday in reviewing the Steelers game. "I think he's gotten into the flow of things, and right now, Ryp is operating the best I've ever seen him."

That's high praise from a coach who just a month ago was less than effusive in his assessment of the sixth-round draft pick from Washington State.

"It's nice to be leading the league in what you're doing, and being 11-0 at the same time, but I take more gratification out of being 11-0," Rypien said Monday. "I worked so hard to become better...to prove those people wrong and show I could lead this football team."

Plays like this have done much to win over the doubters and critics: On Washington's third play from scrimmage Sunday, Gibbs called an off-tackle running play. But when Rypien approached the line of scrimmage, he saw Pittsburgh had seven men in close

NFL leaders

As the NFL regular season heads into its final five weeks, all division leaders except Denver have at least a two-game lead. Washington, the only remaining unbeaten team, has clinched a playoff berth.

division	leader	record	next opponent
NFC East	Washington	11-0	Dallas
NFC Central	Chicago	9-2	Miami
NFC West	New Orleans	9-2	Atlanta
AFC East	Buffalo	10-1	at New England
AFC Central	Houston	9-2	at Pittsburgh
AFC West	Denver	8-3	Idle

in an apparent attempt to stuff the ground play.

So he called an audible and hit Art Monk with a 63-yard pass to the Pittsburgh 1-yard line.

"The difference is he's staying healthy, and he's staying in there," Gibbs said. "He'd shown flashes before and during last year (when Rypien was out for six games with a knee injury), but now he's got the continuity of getting on a roll."

And Gibbs said that during Washington's run, his quarterback has gained the one thing an NFL signal caller needs: confidence.

"That definitely comes with" success, Gibbs said. "He's getting a real good feel for who he is, and until you do that, you don't know how far you can go."

Consecutive games like he's had against Atlanta and the Steelers haven't hurt either. Against the Falcons, he threw for a career-best six touchdowns and 442 yards.

In many respects, Pittsburgh's strategy was the same as Atlanta's — stop the Washington run — with the same disastrous consequences: While the Steelers stuffed the Redskins' running attack, Rypien sat behind his mammoth offensive line and threw to Monk, Ricky Sanders and Gary Clark all afternoon.

"It's a feeling of being comfortable, being in there and getting comfortable," Rypien said. "The confidence, that's one of the main reasons things are falling into place."

But Rypien knows that he's a much different, and more ineffective, quarterback when he feels pressure: In the Philadelphia game in Week 5 — the last time he was sacked — Rypien had linemen in his face all night and responded with a 13-for-23, 204-yard, one-touchdown, two-interception performance. He was dropped twice in the backfield in the first period that night.

But since then, the Redskins have gone 27 quarters (three quarters of Philadelphia plus six complete games) without allowing a sack. Rypien has responded with games like he had against Atlanta and the Steelers to become the NFL's top-rated quarterback.

"Everyone is doing a great job blocking," Rypien said. "The coordination is unbelievable. The receivers are running hot routes, and we're using Ricky (Ervin) to block them up when they try to blitz. That part of our game is spectacular."

Bills win duel with Miami

By the Associated Press

MIAMI — As if Jim Kelly, Thurman Thomas and Andre Reed weren't enough, the Buffalo Bills added a new scoring weapon Monday night — their defense.

Three turnovers produced 17 points, including a fumble return for a touchdown by linebacker Cornelius Bennett, and the Bills beat the Miami Dolphins, 41-27.

Buffalo improved to 10-1, best in the AFC and four games ahead of the second-place New York Jets in the East Division. Miami fell to 5-6 with its 10th loss to Buffalo in the past 11 meetings.

The Bills mounted scoring drives of 83, 65, 72 and 89 yards. Thomas rushed for 135 yards in 23 carries and scored twice. Kelly threw for three touchdowns, including two to Reed.

The 41 points were the most scored by Buffalo against Miami in a regular-season game since their first meeting in 1966, won by the Bills 58-24. The Bills, however, beat the Dolphins 44-34 in the playoffs last January.

Buffalo is accustomed to such production from its offense, ranked No. 1 in the NFL. Big plays by the Bills' defense, ranked 26th, have been much less frequent.

The first and biggest turnover came when a blitzing Bennett beat tackle Mark Dennis to the outside, knocked the ball from Dan Marino's cocked right hand, fell on the fumble at the 6-yard line, stood up and dashed into the end zone. That gave Buffalo the lead for good at 17-10 midway in the second quarter.

Marino suffered another costly turnover on the next play when his underthrown pass was intercepted by Kirby Jackson and returned 12 yards to the Miami 24. Seven plays later, Scott Norwood kicked a 21-yard field goal.

Kenneth Davis added 98 yards rushing on 25 carries.

Magic raises AIDS awareness

1 in 300 college students has HIV; calls with questions increase at Lafene

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

Since Magic Johnson was diagnosed with the HIV virus, the number of students calling Lafene Health Center about AIDS has increased.

Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene, said the exact number of students who have tested positive for the HIV virus, the virus that causes AIDS, is hard to determine because the records are confidential. There is also no way of knowing how many students have gone off campus for testing, she said.

Though the records are confidential, Burke said the number of students who have contacted her about how the virus is contracted has increased in the past week.

"I've had already a number of students who have come in and expressed their concern regarding past sexual involvement with individuals and what kind of risk they have," Burke said.

"Students are concerned because Johnson is heterosexual, and his case has raised the awareness that this is a disease that doesn't discriminate as to race, sex or any other factor."

Burke said what is important is that since Johnson's diagnosis, students are realizing anyone can be affected by the disease.

"The mass number of college students have the attitude that it can't happen to them," she said, "but what students need to realize is that it's not who you are, but what you do that puts you at risk of contracting AIDS."

Burke said though there is no way to find out how many students have AIDS, it is estimated there are as many as 25 cases of AIDS in Riley County. She also said the national average is that one out of every 300 college students is presently infected with the HIV virus.

If these statistics hold true, 60 to 70 K-State students could be infected with the virus.

Lafene's first diagnosed case of AIDS was a student in 1985, and physicians have treated other students since then. Three faculty members have died of AIDS since 1989, Burke said. He expects the number of tests to increase in the future.

"I am sure that concern and actual testing will increase because of the Magic Johnson case," Moeller said.

"If there is some disease that is a threat to our life or happiness, we have a tendency to put it on a back burner until something happens to bring it to the front."

One way Lafene is trying to bring AIDS out into the open is with the establishment of a group of peer AIDS educators. Burke said these students go to various living groups and give AIDS presentations.

"It has been found recently that with peer-to-peer contact, sometimes you'll get the point across a little better," Burke said. "I also go to a variety of classrooms and living groups and do very much the same thing in talking about safer sex practices, STDs and AIDS."

Besides education, Moeller said, people become more aware of a disease when it affects someone they can relate to. It is for this reason, he said, that health care providers are thankful to Johnson for coming out and lending his celebrity to the cause.

Courses limited at pre-enrollment

Business, education 'tight' areas, Bosco says

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

The effects of recent budget cuts at K-State are becoming even more clear as students attempt to pre-enroll for the spring semester.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said the limited resources provided by the state have meant fewer courses and sections will be available for students during the upcoming spring semester.

"We're in fair shape," Bosco said, "but we're tight in the areas we expected, such as upper-level business classes and elementary education method courses."

Bosco said these two areas have experienced tremendous growth in the past few years. He said the majority of students in elementary education are now juniors and seniors.

Karri McKinsey, a senior in elementary education, said three of the classes she needed were closed when she went to pre-enroll. McKinsey said the alternative sections were also closed.

"You think when you are a senior, you should be able to get the classes you want when you want them," she said, "but I had better luck enrolling when I was a sophomore."

McKinsey said that one problem for elementary education majors is that certain classes are needed before they can student teach. She said when those classes are closed, students have to take classes they don't need or want just to fill hours.

Although some students are experiencing problems, pre-enrollment seems to be going well, Registrar Don Foster said.

"I don't yet have the feeling that there are more problems with enrollment than there have been in past semesters," Foster said. "The number of problems that I am seeing now is fairly typical."

He said a group of administrators meet several times during enrollment to work out problem areas and attempt to shift funding and sections to cover those areas.

"That is not an easy task, because these are complex issues where if you touch one class, you affect another," Foster said. "Adjustments can only be done to a limited degree and not always as fast as the needs of the students arise."

Foster said there have been two changes in the pre-enrollment process this semester.

Days have been added to the schedule so student appointments are spread over a longer period of time with less students scheduled at the same time, and enrollment is closed during Thanksgiving week.

Bosco said though the administration is working to improve enrollment procedures and meet the needs of students, more budget cuts will cause further problems.

"I wish that I could say that this is the last of it (budget cuts)," Bosco said, "but as optimistic as I am, we have had a lot of difficult legislative sessions that seem to be directed negatively at our request."

Harley roars in Calvin classroom

Students present company's history with Sportster 883

DEREK BOHLKEN
Contributing Writer

As "Born to Be Wild" played, the distinctive roar of a Harley-Davidson motorcycle filled the room, and a leather-clad biker atop a blue Sportster 883 rode through the doorway of the small classroom in Calvin Hall.

That is how five students in Tom Henricks' Business Strategy class introduced their class project Thursday afternoon. They were assigned to pose as a consulting team for a corporation, and they chose the Harley-Davidson Co.

"We felt we could do more with Harley-Davidson, put on a little bigger production," Susan Spain, senior in accounting, said. "It sounded interesting, and we knew about the turnaround."

Henricks said he was completely unaware what his students had planned for their presentation.

"I guess I should have known something was up when we had to move it to a different classroom," Henricks said. "I thought it was constructive because of its uniqueness. Who would expect them to go out and find someone to drive one right into the classroom? I didn't even know it was in the building."

Spain, Stephanie Keagle and Ryan Goering, seniors in accounting; Mark Nichols, senior in management; and Jen Barnhart, senior in finance, took turns explaining the different aspects of the Harley-Davidson Co. — the history, the leverage buyout and subsequent turnaround since 1981, the marketing and image, the Japanese competitors and their forecasts for the future.

Phil White, Manhattan HOG member, sat astride the bike during most of the presentation.

At the conclusion of the team's analysis, a student asked White about the roar of a Harley opposed to the whine of a Japanese bike.

Spain explained that a man with a stethoscope listens to the sound of each Harley engine.

"He knows when it's just right," she said.

"Kind of like a doctor listening to a human heart — the beat of a Harley-Davidson," Henricks said.

White grinned and said, "I like that." Henricks then asked the presenters many questions, apparently trying to fluster them.

"It would appear that way," he said. "But the purpose of that is to find weaknesses in their analyses, to find the limits of their knowledge."

Other businesses to be analyzed by students in Business Strategy will be Xerox, Polaroid and Delta Airlines.

Farmers

"Every day without an affirmative decision, farmers lose more money, agribusinesses lose more sales, railroads move less grain, and U.S. ports are less active," said Glickman, D-Kan., in a letter to the president. "Meanwhile, competitors are moving into this market aggressively, taking sales and potential income away from U.S. farmers and agricultural businesses."

Glickman said the delays are also causing increasing uncertainty and frustration in the countryside and too much volatility in the commodities markets.

"It's time to move, I don't understand why the secrecy," Glickman said. "There is growing gridlock on domestic policy issues in the administration, and this is just one of the issues they're gridlocked on."

Bush's spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, said Monday he believed the announcement would be "relatively soon," but didn't have a date.

In the interim, however, Madigan said he did not believe the United States was forfeiting markets in the Soviet Union to the European Community, as some lawmakers and farm groups fear.

crats backed away from their support of the measure in light of the stock market's reaction, and the White House predicted the bill would fail.

Even if the idea is dropped analysts said investors seem more skeptical about prospects for economic recovery and concerned by what government actions might be taken heading into an election year.

The credit card issue continued to depress bank stocks Monday, analysts said. Large banks without credit card portfolios were caught up in the trend as well; J.P. Morgan closed down 1/2 at 62 7/8; Bankers Trust was down 1 at 63 7/8.

Though Congress backpedaled on the rate limit bill, the issue isn't expected to go away soon, and the specter of an artificial rate cap will depress bank stocks for some time, said Alison A. Deans, a bank analyst at Smith Barney, Harris Upham & Co.

Among most-active blue chip stocks, Philip Morris gained 1/2 to 69, American Telephone & Telegraph fell 1/8 to 37, General Electric rose 1 1/4 to 68 5/8, General Motors was up 1/2 at 32 and Boeing gained 5/8 to 45 3/4.

Life frustrating for Generation X

Douglas Coupland's novel captures group drowning in baby boom publicity

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

It's hard to believe such great writing comes from a novel that looks like a computer program manual. But Douglas Coupland meant to do that in his debut offering, Generation X.

Generation X is a label given to a group of people born in the late 1960s — I barely made the cut.

Drowning in the wake of the overpublicized baby boomers, the novel's three main characters, Andy, Dag and Claire, reveal themselves through bedtime stories and their quest for eternal hipness.

They are talented but frustrated. And they speak for their generation through cynical vocabulary defined in the margins of the text such as:

McJob — a low-pay, low-prestige, low-dignity, low-benefit, no-future job in the service sector. Frequently considered a satisfying career by people who have never held one.

Jack-and-Jill party — baby showers to which both men and women friends are invited as opposed to only women. Doubled purchasing power of bisexual attendance brings gift values up to Eisenhower-era standards.

Tele-paralyzing — morals used in everyday life that derive from TV sitcom plots: "That's just like the episode where Jan lost her glasses!"

The novel will undoubtedly seem like 183 pages of unnecessary whine to those in the thirty to fortysomething set. But consider the monologue Dag has with his yuppie boss when he quits his McJob in marketing.

"Do you really think we enjoy hearing about your brand new million-dollar home when we can barely afford to eat Kraft Dinner sandwiches in our own grimy little shoe boxes, and we're pushing 30? A home you

BOOK REVIEW

GENERATION X

Douglas Coupland

Documenting the twentysomething generation, Generation X's somewhat underdeveloped characters tell tales of life in the disillusioned lane.

GRADE

won in a genetic lottery, I might add, sheerly by dint of your having been born at the right time in history?

"You'd last about ten minutes if you were my age these days, Martin. And I have to endure pinheads like you rusting above me for the rest of my life, always grabbing the best piece of cake first and then putting a barbed-wire fence around the rest."

With chapters named "I am not a target market" and "Why am I poor?" frustration is clear. It is not the characters themselves who are important here (which is good, because they aren't well developed). They are simply tools to communicate the angst of the generation.

Coupland's writing style is precise in capturing the essence of the characters and the generation as a whole.

He even went to the extent of the trendy desktop layout, complete with sidebars and a serif-sans-serif typeface combo.

Generation X sends an important message to those contained in its definition, as well as those both younger and older.

It's also some great writing, especially for a first novel.

Live CDs musical smorgasbord

Neil Young's lyrics pure energy, most can understand

ROD GILLESPIE
A&E Writer

In his song, "Hey Hey, My My (Into the Black)," Neil Young notes that "It's better to burn out than to fade away."

MUSIC REVIEW

Apparently, he wants to do neither. "Arc" and "Weld," recent live releases from Young and his band, Crazy Horse, deliver a jolt to those who might consider this 1960s relic a has-been.

"Arc" is proof that Young hasn't lost his artistic vision, while "Weld" is evidence that this geezer, as it were, can still rock.

"Arc" is a 35-minute smorgasbord of feedback and sonic mayhem Young clipped from his "Ragged Glory" tour and edited together with the help of a home computer. Feedback fans will hail this CD as art. Everyone else will hail it as noise. I'll leave it to the reader and the listener to decide. Does chaotic cacophony a concept album make?

"Weld" is a 16-song, two-disc compilation of material from Young's storied musical career, with a couple of tastefully done covers thrown in here and there.

The set list reads like a discography of the past 30 years. You want the '60s? Disc one sports a garage-grunge version of Bob Dylan's "Blowing in the Wind."

Do you want the 1970s? Disc two features "Tonight's the Night" and

"Like a Hurricane," among others.

Do you want the 1980s? "Rockin' in the Free World." The 1990s? Young has included "Mansion on the Hill" and "Farmer John" from his most recent studio release, "Ragged Glory."

The CD kicks off with the sure-fire crowd pleaser, "Hey Hey, My My (Into the Black)." The song's heavily distorted trademark introduction ignites the crowd, and Young's wailing, tortured solo is electrifying.

In terms of pure, unbridled energy, "F*!#in' Up" is a clear winner. Over a plodding, methodical thrash backdrop, Young sings the lyrics most of us can relate to: "Why do I keep fuckin' up?"

"I wanted to pick one issue. So I picked the one I thought we were fouling up the most of any public policy issue I could imagine," Dennis was quoted as saying in an April Chicago Tribune article.

Dennis contends that drug use is a victimless crime, and people hate the drug culture because of their own fear or lack of knowledge.

"Americans are willing to countenance an assault on their rights because they fear drug-dealing gangs and foreign narco-terrorists."

"Ironically, legalization would instantly disempower those elements without sacrificing our fundamental freedoms," Dennis said in his essay.

In conjunction with the speech, NORML will set up a booth in the Union today to distribute flyers and provide information about the group. Dennis will also attend NORML's meeting following the speech.

NORML members said they are excited about having a well known drug legalization speaker on campus.

"He's a really reliable speaker," NORML social chairman David Ratzlaff said. "It'll give the group a good boost. It'll bring a lot of good ideas."

Hostage

people being held as hostages, to release them soon," Israel and its proxy force in the region, the South Lebanon Army, holds about 300 Arabs.

Israel gave no quick indication it intended to free any prisoners, but said it was awaiting information about three Israelis missing in action.

Sutherland, who wore a maroon sweater with a red carnation stuck in the front, said he and the others were "humbled" by learning over the past few months of the support the hostages had worldwide.

Anderson "is no longer chained to the wall, thank God, but he is still in a room that has very little fresh air and no light whatsoever," Sutherland said.

"He's a man who should have never been kidnapped," because he was just doing his job as a journalist, he said.

The freed men also showed their sense of humor remained strong. In a comment that drew a big laugh, Sutherland teased Waite about his role as a hostage negotiator for the Church of England.

"All I can say though about the English, they take a hell of a long time to get things done. He came to get me out of here about five years ago. It's taken him five years to get me out," he said.

Waite, wearing a brown and black sweater over a tan shirt, laughed frequently during the news conference. However, his eyes were puffy and bloodshot, and he later told Britons waiting for him outside the ministry "I'm just a bit physically weak."

Sutherland's wife Jean heard of her husband's release while traveling to Iowa from Beirut, where she had remained during Sutherland's captivity. She was on her way to the funeral of her father, who died Saturday, but immediately changed course and headed to Germany.

After speaking with him by telephone, she told reporters at Newark International Airport, "It was just like it was yesterday. We just took off where we left off."

The 6-foot-7 Waite, who had successfully negotiated the release of other Western detainees in Iran and Lebanon came to Beirut in 1987 to try to free Americans held by the Iranian-allied Islamic Jihad. But he was kidnapped himself and held for nearly five years.

Six longtime hostages — three Americans and three Britons — have been freed since August, when Perez de Cuellar took the lead in negotiations. A Frenchman held for three days also was released.

Perez de Cuellar said the rest should be home in time for Christmas.

"That is what I have been offered by the (kidnap) groups, as well as by the Iranian government, which has always given me very strong support, as well as the Syrian government," he said.

Iran and Syria have pivotal roles in the hostage issue because Tehran backs the Shiite Muslim groups and Syria is the main power broker in Lebanon.

Israel and its allied Lebanese militia have freed 66 Arabs in exchange for the remains of one Israeli soldier who had been missing in Lebanon, and news on two others.

The news agency of Qatar, a Persian Gulf emirate, quoted an unidentified Islamic Jihad spokesman as saying his group "expects Israel to reciprocate by releasing another batch of Arab prisoners," including Obeid, who was seized in 1989 in southern Lebanon.

"If Israel reciprocates, then the case of the Western hostages would be resolved altogether," the agency quoted the spokesman as saying in Beirut.

In Los Angeles, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said he was "very upset and very disappointed" about

Tuition

A lack of funding from the state was another reason for the 10 percent increase.

In addition to the cuts the University had to make as a result of Gov. Joan Finney's veto of last year's tax-increase bill, the University did not receive enrollment adjustment funding, said Provost James Coffman. As a result, he said, money had to be reallocated, mostly within the College of Arts and Sciences.

The tuition increase is to make up for this reallocation.

Schellhardt said, "In the years to come, we can expect about the same amount of funding from the state but no increases."

The Wichita State University, University of Kansas and K-State all have the same tuition rate, but the student fees vary at each institution. Including student fees, WSU has the highest tuition followed by K-State then KU.

Kansas institutions are not the only schools hurt by state funding.

According to "The Chronicle of Higher Education," 30 states made cuts in higher education in the past year. The average cut was a 3.9 percent loss in funding.

Edward Goldberg, chancellor of higher education in New Jersey, said he does not expect a quick return to the mid-80s when there was a state support increase of 13 to 19 percent.

"This is something we are going to have to go through for the decade of the 90s," Goldberg said in the article. "It is going to be a more constrained decade than the 80s."

Perhaps the most striking cut in the set is "Cortez the Killer," which was originally released on Young's "Zuma." Young paints a musical palette of gorgeous sonic depth, interspersing his lyrical lament over Cortez's conquest of Central America with waves of distortion and soaring guitar phrases.

"Weld" ends with the goofy hippie anthem "Roll Another Number." It's unclear why Young decided to end the set with this pot-smoker theme song, but the bouncy tune provides an apt finish to two discs worth of angst-driven rockers.

Foster said the increase in tuition will have no negative effect on non-resident students.

Foster said he does not believe the increase of tuition will hurt enrollment.

The downside with "Weld" is that Young has already released live versions of much of the collection's material. A price tag hovering near $28 may scare many consumers away — if you shop at the Manhattan Town Center or Streetside Records.

The up side is that "Weld" clearly contains the wildest, most tumultuous, downright noisiest versions of these songs to date. Perhaps the noise has been cathartic for Young — he has already announced that his next album will be acoustic.

"Arc" and "Weld" can be bought separately or as a special "Arc Weld" set. If you're a collector, buy the set. If you're a music fan on a budget, don't waste your money on "Arc" — it's nothing shocking.

Fire

Board of Regents passed an amendment mandating that all buildings on state-funded university campuses have lightning rods.

Lambert said it can take up to a year to plan the solution to solve some of the problems fire safety inspections bring up.

"I think we have looked at most things, even though we haven't solved them all," he said.

"We have a list of what needs to be done, and each year we work our way down the list a little further. The first thing we need to do in fire safety is get the people out of the buildings, in case of a fire."

Lambert said that there are six buildings that are without fire alarm systems. Ahearn Gymnasium, Call Hall, the power plant, Willard Hall, and Umberger Hall are top priorities, and Calvin Hall will receive the alarm system after the building itself is renovated.

Technology Update: Memorial Hospital

In 1988, Memorial Hospital brought mobile lithotripsy service to the Manhattan area. Lithotripsy uses sound waves to shatter kidney stones, affording a safer, faster, less painful alternative to surgery.

In 1990, we became the first hospital in our area to offer a revolutionary new technique for gallbladder removal. Through the use of a laparoscope, the traditional six to nine inch incision has been replaced by four tiny incisions, and most patients go home the day after surgery.

In 1991, another new surgical procedure was added to Memorial Hospital's list of innovations: endometrial ablation, an alternative to hysterectomy. For many women who experience abnormal bleeding, endometrial ablation, the removal of the tissue lining the uterus, may make a hysterectomy unnecessary. This outpatient procedure poses less surgical risk for the patient and has a recovery time of days as opposed to weeks. For more information, call the Memorial Hospital Surgical Department at 587-4202 or contact the offices of Ron Marshall, M.D. and Harold Henning, M.D. at 537-1414.

Gladiator games at K-State

Center stage at Bramlage Coliseum was shrouded in darkness as thunderous echoes filled the arena Tuesday night. And then the games began.

The American Gladiators, on their first national tour, made their last stop of the tour at Bramlage.

Nitro, Ice, Zap and other one-name gladiators battled with local contestants for prizes like American Gladiators watches, food supplements and a home fitness machine.

Local competitors were Mindie Dodson of Lawrence, Ann Graham, Trevor Graham, J.D. Hand, Cathy Huey, Matt Laurie, Elaine Ritter and Dean Smith, all of Manhattan.

Ritter and Laurie received gold medals for their performance and Huey and Hand earned second-place medals.

"We sold about 4,300 tickets, over 1,000 of those were sold today. We tried to price the tickets inexpensively so that families could come," Bramlage Coliseum director Charles Thomas said.

Susanne Schmeling, a promoter for events at Bramlage, said, "It's so unique. We weren't sure how it would go over."

The competition included six events. They were the assault, the wall, powerball, break through and conquer, the joust and the eliminator.

The commentator opened the show by saying, "Hello, Manhattan! How about those K-State Wildcats? And how about those Jayhawks?" Any K-State fan can guess how the audience responded.

Adam Johnson, 10, is a long-time fan of the American Gladiators.

His favorite is Laser.

Stock prices fall sharply in heavy selling

Dow Jones closes down 41.15 points despite late recovery

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Stock prices fell sharply Tuesday in what was widely viewed as a continuation of Friday's 120-point fall.

ECONOMY

Analysts said the heavy selling came amid growing frustration over Washington's mishandling of the economy.

The Dow Jones average of 30 industrials, down more than 75 points in early afternoon, recovered slightly to close down 41.15 points at 2,931.57.

The sharp drop triggered a "circuit breaker" at the New York Stock Exchange, which restricts computer-driven program selling when the average falls at least 50 points. The rule was designed to prevent declines from accelerating and was put in place after the 1987 stock market crash.

The Dow on Monday gained 29.52 points after falling 120.31 points on Friday, the worst decline in two years.

The broader market was hit again Tuesday. Declining issues outnumbered advances by about 4 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Big Board volume totaled 241.38 million shares as of 4 p.m., against 238.17 million in the previous session.

The most actively traded issue on the NYSE was Glaxo Holdings, down

Despite the overall downward trend, U.S. Bioscience reported a dramatic gain. The company rose 7 1/2 at 47 1/8 on the American Stock Exchange after it acquired rights to market an anti-cancer agent in western Europe.

Market analysts blamed the sell-off largely on continued nervousness about the economy and a belief stock prices remain too high amid languid economic conditions.

Some economists and bankers said the Senate's passage of a cap on credit-card interest rates last week was partially to blame for Friday's sharp fall.

Texas woman's body identified

No evidence of gunplay, officials say

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

A woman's body, which was found in a wooded area at Fort Riley by a soldier on Sunday, has been identified as Phillis Geiger, 19.

Geiger had been dead one to two weeks. An autopsy was performed Tuesday to determine the cause of death. Results are expected to be revealed today.

Officials from Fort Riley's Criminal Investigation Division said no evidence of a knife or gunshot wound, was found.

Geiger had been living with various relatives in Junction City since she arrived from El Paso, Texas, in late June.

Mary Geiger, Phillis Geiger's grandmother, said she did not know why Phillis Geiger was at Fort Riley or what happened to her.

"We're very anxious to get the results of the autopsy," she said. Although Phillis Geiger stayed at Mary Geiger's residence occasionally, Mary Geiger said she did not know a lot about her granddaughter.

"She kept to herself," Mary Geiger said. "She was staying with me off and on, sometimes with my daughter, sometimes at the post with her friends. She never told me who the friends were," she said. "She would go out

Campus recycling program limited by lack of funds

Collection sites reduced; campus, community helps

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Limited funds are inhibiting the growth of K-State's pilot recycling program.

ENVIRONMENT

The pilot program, established in March 1989, has been faced with limited funding. Since its beginning, there has been no budget set aside for recycling. Al Seely, physical plant supervisor, said costs were to be assumed by the facilities division.

In the first few months, Seely said, the program had already cost $20,000, and only $2,000 has been returned from aluminum cans. Mounting costs forced the program to reduce its collection sites on campus from 20 to eight and to set a spending cap of $7,500 for next year.

"The campus community has picked up the slack," Seely said. "Two students are volunteering 29 hours a week, and employees are helping haul computer paper from their offices to the eight central sites. Most people have shown they're willing to take enough time during the day to help recycle."

With the help of the campus community, K-State has reduced the waste stream by one or two percent since March.

"Although this may not be that much, this material would have been in the landfill," Seely said.

Currently, the program recycles colored and white bond paper, computer paper, newsprint and aluminum cans.

Seely said the majority of the waste taken to the landfill still consists mainly of paper products, and recycling paper is costly and requires much labor.

A special ad-hoc recycling committee was formed by George Miller, former vice president for administration and finance, in March 1988 to look into a possible K-State pilot recycling program. Ed Rice, facilities assistant vice president, said the committee helped establish the program and then convened.

Homeless struggle for survival

Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. provides support, services to improve life

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

A middle-aged man walked by the big old house and stared blankly at its rugged frame. He approached some ladies there and asked for a blanket. It was cold, and he was living under a bridge, he said. He had spent the day day collecting cans. He said he thought he'd have enough money at the end of the day to have a hot meal.

The ladies gave him towels because they had no blankets. He was grateful.

He walked away and headed back to the bridge.

For some, the spawn of cold weather is a signal to store summer clothes once again. But for many people in Manhattan without jobs, homes or families, the long chilly nights ahead increase the struggle for survival.

The big old house is the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., which in 1990 provided 4,254 nights of service to 506 guests, 72 percent of whom were from Manhattan.

With a dedicated staff and volunteers from the area, the shelter is able to provide services to improve the lives of the homeless as well as providing them with the support they need to get back into the community to achieve their goals.

"Our goal is to provide services to improve their lives and our services as well, not missing anything that needs attention," said Kathy Rankin, executive director of MESI.

The shelter opened on Jan. 8, 1985 and is supported by the United Way, the City of Manhattan and the community. It is able to house 26 guests per night. The shelter typically provides services for one- and two-parent families and single men and women. It offers shower and laundry facilities, clothing giveaways, referrals, case management and life-skills classes.

Rankin said many people think homelessness is something you only see in larger cities or on television. She said most of the shelter's guests are between the ages of 18 and 25, are minimally skilled and few have high school diplomas.

"These are the true homeless we see," Rankin said.

She said some have had prior records with the police or have been substance abusers at one time, but for the most part they are normal people who have lost their support systems, leaving them unmotivated.

The shelter offers a life-skills program as a means of giving their guests ways of overcoming some of their problems. The program strives to help participants in their function in society as independent and viable citizens. It is comprised of eight modules. Each may be taught individually as needed.

The shelter is able to remain strong through the support it receives. Meals are donated almost regularly from local agencies and churches as well as the Manhattan Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Donna Brower, 31 years old and 17 weeks pregnant, had been at the shelter for several weeks.

The wind blew her brown hair as she sat crosslegged in a chair on the rugged old porch of the shelter. She sat peacefully in a calico sun dress and pink flip-flops as she rocked back and forth.

Gorbachev behind coup, says Gadhafi

MOSCOW (AP) — Libya's Moammar Gadhafi believes Mikhail Gorbachev himself was behind the failed August coup, and that communism's collapse gave the West more than it would have achieved in a nuclear war, according to a newspaper interview.

Gadhafi was also quoted by Pravda as warning that a Fourth Reich could emerge in Germany. He suggested that a new Jewish state be set up in Alsace and Lorraine to avoid resumption of the historic conflict between France and Germany over those regions.

At the time of the coup against Gorbachev, Gadhafi sent a congratulatory cable to the plotters at the time, calling their action a "bold, historic deed."

In the interview made available Tuesday, Gadhafi was quoted as saying, "I thought the coup was organized by Gorbachev himself, since the Emergency Committee men were close to him and he himself had selected them."

"Many believed that these people executed his will while he stayed in the Crimea. The Emergency Committee had to help Gorbachev out of the grave situation he had found himself in."

The Emergency Committee, including the country's vice president, military and KGB leaders, announced Aug. 19 it had taken control of the government because Gorbachev was ill.

Pravda said Gadhafi felt that not even a nuclear war between the superpowers could have accomplished what the West achieved without firing a shot when the coup failed.

"What we have is the collapse of the Soviet Union, the collapse of the Warsaw pact, the collapse of communism and the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Eastern Europe. ... The whole world has suffered from the disintegration of the Soviet Union," Pravda quoted the Libyan leader as saying.

The paper quoted Gadhafi as saying the recent Middle East Peace conference in Madrid was a fiasco and no peace settlement was possible because "Israel cannot live without wars."

Misdemeanors caused by disobedience

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — A television news van ripped a hole in a water hose supplying firefighters battling last month's deadly wildfire when the driver ignored officials and zoomed into a restricted area, police said.

Hing Chung Ng, 27, was charged Monday with interfering with a firefighter discharging his duties, failing to obey a traffic officer and failure to obey a firefighter, all misdemeanors.

Thirty firefighters were without water for 30 minutes, a situation that caused the loss or damage of some homes, Oakland fire officials said.

The Oct. 20 inferno killed 25 people, destroyed more than 3,000 homes and caused an estimated $1.5 billion in damage.

Ng told officers he worked for KPIX, the local CBS affiliate. News director Harry Fuller did not return repeated telephone calls from The Associated Press.

Police said Ng ignored orders from officers and ignored cones and flares before he ran over the 5-inch hose.

Flu outbreak may be earlier this year

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — The Kansas Department of Health and Environment Monday reported that recent outbreaks of flu in children in the Kansas City, Kan., area may be a precursor to an early and more severe flu season.

Public health officials have isolated influenza in at least five Johnson and Wyandotte County residents.

The department said in a release it is rare to have flu reported this early in the year. Most flu outbreaks start in December, KDHE said.

Engineering funds stable

MIKE VENSO/Staff

Dean of Engineering Donald Rathbone talks to faculty and students during a forum Tuesday in Durland Hall about equipment spending using the new $100-per-semester student fee. He said a new personal computing lab will be finished by the end of the spring semester.

$100 student fee won't cause underfunding of college, Rathbone says

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Engineering funding has not been cut because of the $100-per-semester fee that students in the college are now paying.

That is how Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, answered a student's concern that the University might be underfunding the college now that student money is available to help fund equipment expenditures.

Rathbone answered questions and addressed concerns from students and faculty in the college at a forum on the equipment fee Tuesday night in Durland Hall. The session was organized by the Engineering Student Council and the Institute of Industrial Engineers.

Rathbone said the administration hasn't cut back funding to the college because of the fee.

"They haven't given anybody anything — that's the bottom line," Rathbone said. "It's not because they haven't wanted to help. It's because they haven't had very much equipment fee money."

Rathbone said all colleges at K-State are feeling the effects of tight funding.

"I feel good about central administration," Rathbone said. "I think they've stayed in the boat."

Fund-raising efforts from outside sources have also continued.

Rathbone said he has been able to raise about a million dollars a year.

"One thing I think we've done very well is to leverage your money," he said.

Rathbone also explained a list of projects that are commitments by the college and are funded in part by the engineering equipment fee.

One of the primary expenditures the fee will help fund is a $205,000 personal computer lab to be installed in Seaton Hall by the end of the spring semester. Engineering students will pay for $105,000 of the lab's cost.

The lab will be equipped with IBM-type model 486 PCs and a server that would allow classes to be taught in the lab during the day. Students will be able to use the computers in the evening.

"We're going to have up-to-date computer facilities available to students and faculty, because the 486 is a powerful machine," Rathbone said.

The computers will primarily be used by upper-level and graduate students, but they will probably also be available to other students in the college, he said.

"Somebody suggested to me that for students to use 486s is like using a hammer to kill a fly," he said. "Obviously, the faculty did not agree with that."

Students said they were concerned with how accessible the lab will be to them.

Rathbone said his main concerns were with the security of the computers in the lab, as well as ensuring that engineering students had primary access to the machines.

Shevardnadze back as minister

Return to post boosts Gorbachev's authority in Kremlin

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Eduard Shevardnadze is returning as Soviet foreign minister, officials announced Tuesday, giving an immediate boost to his long-time friend Mikhail Gorbachev's struggle to revive Kremlin authority.

The reappointment of Shevardnadze, who helped end the Cold War but then quit as foreign minister last December, warning of dictatorship in the Kremlin, drew immediate praise from President Bush and other Western leaders.

"We know him well and have great respect for him," Bush told reporters as he met in the White House with Alexander Yakovlev, another member of the original Gorbachev team that began the perestroika reforms.

The genial, white-haired Shevardnadze, 63, and other Soviet leaders had no immediate public comment on the appointment, but state TV called it "just as sensational" as his resignation 11 months ago.

The appointment bolstered world confidence in Gorbachev as he struggled to forge a new confederation among the remaining 12 Soviet republics and persuade them to assume responsibility for the $81 billion Soviet debt.

"In a particularly difficult moment for the U.S.S.R., the return of Shevardnadze will contribute to giving the world a guarantee of having in Moscow not only secure, but also trustworthy and capable partners in dialogue," Italian Foreign Minister Gianni De Michelis said.

The reappointment was the latest turn in a remarkable life. Shevardnadze had made a career in the Communist Party and police apparatus in his native Georgia until Gorbachev surprised the world by naming him foreign minister in 1985.

As Gorbachev's chief emissary to the West, Shevardnadze hammered out treaties under which the Soviet Union slashed its nuclear and conventional arsenals and agreed to withdraw its armies from eastern Europe. Soviet satellite regimes and the Berlin Wall toppled, enraging hard-liners.

Shevardnadze, with a theatrical flair, stunned the world last Dec. 20.

Rocket trouble delays the shuttle

Atlantis' military mission postponed for at least 5 days

By the Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — NASA delayed Tuesday's launch of space shuttle Atlantis for at least five days because of last-minute trouble with a rocket needed to lift a military spy satellite thousands of miles above Earth.

The countdown was halted just before workers were to begin fueling the spaceship for a night liftoff. The shuttle's six astronauts were asleep when the flight was called off.

The problem was traced to a navigation unit in the rocket attached to the $300 million missile-warning satellite. Workers will enter the cargo bay of Atlantis and replace the unit.

"There was no way we could tell that this was coming," said William Lenoir, head of NASA's space flight program.

The second countdown could begin early Friday, leading to a Sunday night liftoff, if the replacement and retesting of the unit goes as planned, officials said.

"While we're anxious to begin our mission as soon as possible, we also recognize the importance of making sure that our flight is both safe and successful," mission commander Frederick Gregory said.

If repairs take much longer than a week, the Thanksgiving holiday could be a further complication in scheduling.

The budget-conscious space agency will try to keep the Thanksgiving weekend free for the launch team and thus save hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Gladiators

"He's stronger and he wins a lot and makes it so people can't score," he said.

Johnson was standing in the bleachers above the locker rooms and said, "I'm staying right here. See? There's Blaze now. Blaze! Blaze!"

The competition began with the assault. This event required the contestants to reach five stations and fire a weapon at each one. Meanwhile, the gladiators shot tennis balls at the gladiators. "Those tennis balls reach speeds of up to 100 miles an hour," said the commentator.

Trevor Graham was the only contestant in this event to score the maximum 10 points by hitting a bull's eye with an arrow. But all of the contenders had difficulty firing the weapons.

"Our only practice was today from noon until about 5 p.m.," Ann Graham, Trevor's wife, said.

Next came the wall. Everyone strapped into a safety harness to protect them from falling to the ground. Two of the competitors had to scale a wall at least three stories tall while two gladiators dogged them and tried to pull the competitors off the wall. Laurie and Hand were the only two to make it to the top without being dragged off.

The powerball, Ice's favorite event, followed.

Three gladiators tackled, shoved, pushed and did anything they could to prevent two contenders from slamming soccer balls into five barrels.

The highest scorers were Hand and Trevor Graham. Hand got 15 points, some of which were accidentally scored by Graham, who used the wrong color of ball to score with. Graham scored several of his six points with quick footwork. He happens to be an assistant track coach.

Break through and conquer. That's the name of the game. On a quasi-football end zone one competitor tries to break through a gladiator and score a touchdown. Then the contestant must wrestle another gladiator to the ground. Or try to, at least. The American Gladiators swept this category.

Jousting while standing on a platform with air cushions below is a fun time for Gemini.

"It's the purest form of one-on-one competition there is. It's all about athletic ability," he said. Gemini proved his prowess in this event by knocking Hand off the platform in under three seconds. Laurie and Rutter were the only two contestants who managed to stay on the platform until their time was up.

Major problem

K-State has no minors program

Once again, K-State is last.

The last school in the Big Eight without a minors program, that is, and students are tired of it.

Many of the Student Governing Association candidates, including Student Body President-elect Jackie McClaskey, promised to help implement a minors program. They have an obligation to follow up on those promises. But, the buck doesn't stop at SGA alone. In fact, it doesn't even begin there.

The final say in the matter of a minors program rests in the hands of the Faculty Senate. And if their past actions are any indication, they don't seem to think it's a priority.

Oh, they've "kicked the idea around," for at least two years, but something "more pressing" always comes up. And the end result? The minors program proposal gets shoved to the back burner.

And it's a long way up to the front. The process by which Faculty Senate would approve a minors program is long and drawn out. That's not to be faulted — all options need to be looked at in order to gain the best program possible. But that long, drawn-out process also means that Faculty Senate needs to make a minors program a priority as soon as possible.

And that's where K-State students become important.

Drop by Faculty Senate's office or give it a call. Let faculty senators know you think a minors program is important.

If you don't make it a priority, neither will Faculty Senate.

Faculty Senate, Eisenhower 22, 532-5738

Minors program process

The process by which a minors program would be implemented at K-State is outlined below.

- Faculty Senate decides if K-State will have program.
- Faculty in various departments devise curriculum.
- Program is approved by departmental faculty.
- Program goes to Dean of College for approval.
- Approval by curriculum committee of college.
- Goes to academic affairs committee of Senate for approval.
- Program is approved by Faculty Senate.

Beat the holiday rush

Pay other people's tickets today

Friendly reminders from the KSU Police Department have been awaiting students in their mailboxes recently.

It's not a cheery holiday greeting but an update on all the parking fines students owe this fine institution.

The old carbon-copied tickets of old have been replaced with new high-tech, streamlined computer forms that illustrate the debt.

Unfortunately, this new style of informing students has been quite inaccurate.

Many people have reported they received incorrect billing information, and on many occasions, the person who received the tickets is not the same person receiving the bill.

Often, the person who initially received the tickets is the sibling of the person who now is being asked to pay the late fines.

What makes the process even more complicated is the timing of the mailings.

People are receiving the notifications just as enrollment begins. Students trying to enroll are forced to pay all their fines before enrolling, and in the rush to get through the arduous process, many students may be paying fines that do not belong to them.

Students who receive these notices should read them carefully. And if the errors exist, make sure the parking division voids the false charges.

The parking division of the police department needs to revamp its billing system to eliminate this problem. A re-evaluation of its policy of billing delinquent tickets to debtors' siblings is also needed. This practice is not only illegal, but it's unethical.

Problems with Playboy perhaps?

Editor,

I would like to apologize to every woman of K-State who wants to be displayed in Playboy's "Girls of the Big Eight" pictorial. I am deeply sorry for my involvement (however indirect) in the process by which you decided that posing for David Chan was a smart thing to do.

I will most certainly not buy the issue in which you appear. But neither will I hesitate to look at it should I stumble across a copy accidentally. Please accept in advance my apology for the thoughts I will have while staring at your picture.

And if I should meet you after your debut, forgive me for thinking we've met before. I will never be able to forget the first time I saw you. The things I made you beg for, made you do; the things I did to you and to myself — all of this will cloud my mind when I finally get to see you in the flesh. Please forgive me if I act as if I know you, have known you and, in fact, own you.

K-State cares

Editor,

As Jon Wefald always says: "K-State cares."

This proved true during the Bone Marrow Donor Drive Nov. 12 in the K-State Union. Students, faculty/staff and the administration showed their overwhelming support for a fellow student.

You all cannot imagine the pride I have felt being associated with all of these people. (Everyone who has donated time, money, supplies, ideas or themselves is a donor.)

Now we have to continue to work harder and raise money for the 400 some people who have signed up to be tested and for the NMDP that is running low on funds. This is an important program that allows ordinary, everyday people to save a life.

I have faith in all of you and in God that we can do this. Many 22-year-olds out there want 50 more years of life — I want that chance.

We will keep working and hopefully have another drive put together by February. We need your help and your support.

You're all terrific!

K-State-Salina positive merger

Editor,

I am writing in response to Lisa Sneath's article in the Nov. 14 issue of the Collegian. I too have strong feelings concerning the KSU-KCT merger because I am a former KCT student.

First of all, KCT did not, or will not, ever lose its identity. Before, there had been rumors of closing the school due to low enrollment. But now K-State-Salina is on the map and will stay there. Also, the benefits gained by being associated with a major university such as K-State are overwhelming. A new dormitory and union will be built. The aeronautical building will be expanded. Lab equipment will be updated. Students themselves will face greater challenges. Get the picture yet?

Furthermore, you comment on the picture of "the four naked men." I think I should inform you about our newspaper. The Collegian makes it a common practice to run material that is controversial in order to encourage and enhance students of higher-level institutions to develop views and moral ideas about the issues they may have otherwise overlooked without a forum such as a college newspaper. The students are challenged to think critically. This is another benefit you can now enjoy.

The simple truth is that KCT needed K-State to survive. The benefits gained far outweigh the minor inconveniences imposed. I hope that K-State-Salina students are open-minded and optimistic enough to make the merger a successful one.

Bush's sequel also called 'Judgment Day'?

In a 20-minute speech to an FFA convention in Kansas City last week, President Bush joked that next year he would probably star in an "abbreviated sequel" of the Arnold Schwarzenegger film, "Terminator 2." I read in the Kansas City Star that Bush said it would be called "Term 2."

The Star didn't mention that the subtitle of Schwarzenegger's film was "Judgment Day," a fact which gives Bush's remarks a somewhat different gravity.

The paper did report that Schwarzenegger had been invited to the speech, and it quoted another of Bush's remarks to the young audience: "We're looking to you for fresh ideas and energy. We're counting on you to become the Schwarzeneggers of a tough global marketplace."

There's nothing wrong with "fresh ideas and energy," aside from the fact that they are only words — words that mean so little without the ideas and energy they invoke. And one can hardly blame Bush for this Schwarzenegger business. His speech was probably written by some writer left over from the Reagan administration.

There's an undeniable emotional appeal to the idea of Americans holding their own in the world, economically and otherwise. But this particular expression of it seems suspicious when one considers that (in "Terminator 2," anyhow) Schwarzenegger was paid to essentially keep a straight face and speak in a monotone. It was a job that required Schwarzenegger's image, but very little or no talent.

In fact, one could probably argue that George Bush is a better actor than Arnold Schwarzenegger. But that would be another column.

So far as this "Terminator 2" business goes, I saw the movie two weeks ago when Feature Films brought it to the Union. I concluded that it had been barely worth my evening and nowhere near worth the hundred million dollars that had been spent making it.

One memorable aspect of the movie transpires after one of the Terminators (played by Schwarzenegger, of course) is told that he can't just go around killing people. He doesn't kill anybody else, but instead shoots people in the kneecaps with a sawed-off shotgun when they get in his way.

One can hope (even metaphorically) Bush does not mean for his little Schwarzeneggers to cruelly cripple the competition in the global market. That action would take a toll, sometime and somewhere.

A week after Feature Films brought "Terminator 2" to the Union, the committee showed "Boyz N The Hood." This writer regrets he was out of town and could not attend the movie but has heard from various people and critics that it is a film of substantial social value. One can tell from the previews that it explores the formidable social problems that street gangs and inner-city violence are posing in contemporary America.

There's a parable in this comparison:

"Terminator 2," which cost one hundred million dollars to make, made two hundred million dollars at the box office. Therefore, anyone who might have invested one dollar in it got two dollars back.

"Boyz N The Hood," on the other hand, cost only seven million dollars to make and made 49 million dollars at the box office. Anyone who had invested one dollar in the making of this movie would have received seven.

President Bush's judgment day is coming up in 1992. There's more to a movie, or a governmental office, than an image, and you'd have never seen Arnold Schwarzenegger in "Boyz N The Hood."

It's your choice. Where's your dollar going to go?

Cartoon's double meanings not funny

Editor,

Daryl Blasi's cartoon of Nov. 15 really angered me. His strip is usually funny, but when he starts to moralizing about political and social issues, it irritates me to no end, even on the few occasions when I agree with what he has to say. If Blasi is going to draw editorial cartoons, they should appear on the editorial page.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE IN THE 1800'S: A QUESTION OF RIGHT OR WRONG?

Collegian, students must repent

Editor,

The K-State newspaper may be charged with pornography. It seems to be an open and shut case. Printing four naked people should be an offense to any Christian. Has K-State forsaken God? If not, then let us see how they repent. Let them uphold things of God. Let them support ministries fully — where Jesus is uplifted, and not joining hands with the ACLU, the homosexual, the supporter of condoms, the supporter of promiscuity, the supporters of adultery.

It appears that Magic Johnson is turning his power and prestige to the beast mentioned in the Bible.

No superintendent of schools should allow Magic Johnson in his schools with Johnson's permissiveness.

I strongly suspect that any person writing to the editor contrary to the above message does not have Jesus in his or her heart.

I can only say Jesus loves you — invite him into your heart.

There is going to be fire from the sun that is going to scorch men; Rev. 16:8. I would not want to be an unbeliever. I believe there is going to be a hospital built with many burn units. When this hospital is built, know that the time is at hand.

Pedestrians cruisin' for bicycle bruising

Editor,

You can hardly walk across campus without having an encounter with a bicycle. Everywhere you look somebody is riding their bike on a sidewalk — weaving in and out around pedestrians and causing a potential hazard.

The other day while walking to class, I witnessed a woman get knocked down by a cyclist. Although she was not seriously injured, she'll be suffering unnecessary pain for a few days. This accident occurred only because someone was riding their bicycle on the sidewalk. Sidewalks are constructed for only one type of traffic — pedestrians.

According to K-State's traffic regulations cyclists are instructed to "ride on designated bike paths, bike lanes or in the street." Not on the sidewalk. In addition to this, violators may be charged a fine of $10.00 for "riding on a sidewalk, pedestrian walkway or grass."

However, this policy is rarely, if ever, enforced. How many times have you heard someone say, "I got a ticket for riding my bike on the sidewalk?"

Never. So, the next time you see someone speeding by on a bicycle say something. You may just prevent a more serious accident from happening.

Cats fans should be thankful

I know it's more than a week away, but I'm devoting this column to every college student who, like me, is desperately hanging on until Thanksgiving.

It's times like these when you realize the true role athletics play on a college campus. If not for the Wildcat football team, which has provided a much-needed diversion with its inspiring Saturday afternoon performances, I might have snapped long ago.

Thanksgiving brings not only a break from the daily grind of college, but, as always, it reminds us to reflect upon the things that make life truly worth living. For sports fans, the holiday couldn't come at a better time of the year.

The week of relaxation falls during possibly the most exciting time of the year. It's an excellent time for sports fans to count their blessings.

I missed the American Gladiators Tuesday night, so if anyone should have a hard time finding things to be thankful for, it would be me.

Despite missing that thrilling athletic event, even I can join fellow sports fans in giving thanks for the many blessings that surround the fall holiday.

One must begin by giving thanks for the success of the football team. The Cats' 6-4 record can't be fully appreciated by those who never suffered through typical K-State seasons. Anyone who witnessed the 17-17 tie with KU four seasons ago or the disintegration of a 28-point lead in a game with Louisiana Tech knows what it means to be a doormat.

Beating KU, scaring the pants off Nebraska, playing for a bowl berth — the season has been triumphant by K-State standards. But the thing fans have to be most thankful for is the dissatisfaction shared by Coach Bill Snyder and the football team.

Snyder will not settle for a 7-4 season. His goal, he has said, is to see K-State make the greatest turnaround in college football history. That means two more reasons for K-State to be thankful: 1) Better things are on the way for the football program, and 2) Snyder should be guiding the team for some time, contrary to rumors that have him heading to such noted programs as Ohio State and USC.

Professional football fans have a new reason to be counting their blessings. Not only does Thanksgiving give them the traditional opportunity to stuff themselves with turkey and dressing while soaking up six straight hours of football, but now the action focuses on two of the best running backs in the league. Because Turkey Day annually features the Detroit Lions and the Dallas Cowboys, Barry Sanders and Emmett Smith will be the toast of the holiday for years to come.

The Kansas City Chiefs are on the verge of locking up a playoff spot. While their luck has not been particularly good, they have established a position among the top teams in the NFL. As in the case of K-State football fans, years of disappointment make the Chiefs' 7-4 record a reason to give thanks.

Next, college basketball season gets underway, and the non-conference matchups of Thanksgiving are always exciting and unpredictable. Who can forget the roll KU went on two seasons ago, beating LSU, UNLV and St. John's at Thanksgiving to rocket from out of nowhere into the nation's No. 1 ranking?

The Wildcat basketball fans have particular reason to be thankful this season. After suffering through a 13-15 season, they will finally see some new faces around the Big Eight this season, instead of the ones they had grown tired of, namely Doug Smith, Shaun Vandiver, Victor Alexander and Mark Randall.

K-State fans, and sports fans in general, should be especially thankful as they enjoy the upcoming holiday.

Smith nears milestone

Senior WR expects to 'cry for awhile' after season ends

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

Maybe Monday or Tuesday — at least a couple of days after Saturday's game with Oklahoma State — Michael Smith will probably start to feel the satisfaction of four years of hard work.

"I haven't really let it get to me yet," Smith said. "But when the game ends, then I'll probably cry for awhile."

But Smith said he will have nothing but smiles for the K-State program — a program that took a chance on him four years ago.

"Just seeing where this program has gone since I've arrived is just amazing," Smith said. "To go from 0-11 my first year to possibly 7-4 this year is mind-boggling."

But more than these numbers stick out when one looks at what the 5-foot-9, 160-pound New Orleans native has done over his career.

In Smith's freshman season, he caught just eight passes.

"I wish I had caught more," he said. "But we had a couple of other receivers then who were the top guys, so I had to wait."

But since then, Smith has assured himself of becoming a Big Eight legend.

Going into his final game, Smith has caught 178 passes and amassed 2,451 receiving yards. The receptions put Smith in second place on the all-time Big Eight list behind Oklahoma State's Hart Lee Dykes. The yardage total is good for third, just 28 yards behind Nebraska's Johnny Rodgers (2,479) and 728 yards behind Dykes (3,171).

"I never thought upon arriving that it would turn out like this," Smith said, "not even in my wildest dreams."

But those dreams almost never came true.

Smith first arrived on the K-State campus in the fall of 1988 as a walk-on. Then K-State coach Stan Parrish met with him and promised he could get a scholarship after playing as a walk-on the first year.

"That was kind of rough," Smith said. "Paying out-of-state tuition was really hard on my parents financially. Then Parrish announced his resignation about halfway through the year, and I didn't know whether I would get a scholarship or not."

When K-State coach Bill Snyder arrived during the Christmas break, he quickly called Smith at his home and said that he would no longer have to worry about tuition. The new coach was giving him what the old one promised.

"That was a really neat surprise," Smith said. "Here's this guy just taking a chance on me just based on what he saw on some films. I wasn't sure I wanted to return to K-State after the semester ended. But Coach Snyder took a chance on me, so I figured I could take a chance on him. And it's worked out quite well."

Snyder's first year, 1989, was Smith's first big year. He set a K-State record for receptions with 70, including 13 in the game against Missouri, another K-State record.

"We got our first win in a long time that year," Smith said. "I was just able to do things right."

After a less than stellar year for the Cats on the field, going 1-10, Smith earned honorable mention All-America from both wire services, was a first team all-Big Eight performer.

But Smith said the records may not have happened if it wasn't for his teammate, roommate and best friend — wide receiver Frank Hernandez.

"I've learned a lot from him," Smith said. "I watch the way he moves on the field and how he catches the ball, and I try to copy that. If I could catch the ball the way he does — he knows exactly how to use his hands to catch the ball — I would be a more complete package of a receiver."

"I've dropped a few passes which I think he would probably have caught. But I'm still learning to bring my game up to that other level and that's part of it. Hopefully, I'll be there someday."

Even though the Cats won't be headed for a bowl game, Smith has plenty of postseason work headed his way. He will be playing in the Blue-Gray Game, the Japan Bowl and the East-West Shrine Game. All are games for college all-stars.

"If I have a shot at making it to the pros, then this is my chance to do it," Smith said. "But I'm just hoping that I play well and represent K-State well. If I can do those two things, then I'll be happy."

But right now, Oklahoma State is on Smith's mind, and what he would like most is to get the seventh win of the season.

Golfers finish fifth at Jaguar

By the Collegian staff

Improving in both place and score, K-State's golf team shot one of its best rounds of the year to finish fifth at the 15-team Jaguar Classic at Augusta, Ga.

The team shot a second-round score of 301 to improve two strokes from Monday's four-man total. The better round helped the Cats climb from eighth to fifth place in the team competition.

Junior Richard Laing finished seventh individually, firing a 36-hole total of 146. He shot a 72 in the second round to go with his 74 from Monday.

Laing would have placed higher, but he received a two-stroke penalty in the opening round. He was just three shots behind the tournament's medalist.

"Laing played his normal, consistent game," Coach Mark Elliott said. "Even with his two-stroke penalty for playing the wrong ball, he still scored well and kept us in contention."

K-State fought its way out of an early-season slump that saw the Cats fall out of contention in the first round of each of the season's first three meets. In addition to Tuesday's finish, the team finished eighth at the 14-team Texas International Golf Championships Nov. 4-5.

Junior Jim Brenneman was one of the Cats who came on strong. He had missed the prior meet by failing to qualify but rebounded to post a two-day total of 151. Brenneman finished 25th at the tournament.

The Cats finished 23 strokes behind team champion and tournament host Augusta College.

The meet was the final performance for the men this fall. They will continue action in March.

Orioles' ironman Ripken tabbed MVP

Fielder angered by vote, finishes second in balloting for second time

By the Associated Press

BALTIMORE — A little over a year ago, Cal Ripken had hit rock bottom. He was in a lengthy slump that had him wondering just how long he could stay in the game.

Today, the Baltimore Orioles' shortstop is on top of the baseball world. He won his second American League MVP award on Tuesday, becoming the first AL player ever to win the award with a losing team.

Ripken's statistics in 1991 — a .323 batting average with 34 homers and 114 RBIs — evidently were more important to the voters than the Orioles' numbers: a 67-95 record and a sixth-place finish in the seven-team AL East. But a year earlier, Ripken had been involved in a year-long struggle that made this season all that much more stunning.

He batted .209 through June 13 and had to rally to close with a career-low .250 mark. It seemed like he tried a new batting stance every week.

"The frustration was very big last year. I hit rock bottom," he said. "The consistency just wasn't there. I had envisioned myself with a long career, but I began to think that I might not be able to play that long."

If 1991 is any indication, the 31-year-old Ripken could be around for quite a while. He worked on a new stance prior to the season, stuck with it, and never had a prolonged slump in chalking up career-high numbers in average, homers and RBIs.

"I was hopeful that I could return to some form of consistency, but I didn't think it would happen so fast," he said.

Ripken received 15 first-place votes, eight seconds, four thirds and one seventh for 318 points in balloting by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Cecil Fielder of the Detroit Tigers, who led the majors with 133 RBIs and tied for the major-league lead in homers with 44 homers, was second with 286 points. Fielder, the runner-up last year to Oakland's Rickey Henderson, got nine first-place votes, 12 seconds, six thirds and one seventh. early collapse took some of the fun out of the award.

"I don't think it can replace not having a winning season, because when you're an athlete in a team sport, the only thing that really matters is winning," he said. "Not to downplay being awarded the MVP, but in comparison, there is no comparison. Winning the World Series and being on a winning team is the best feeling you can have."

Fielder did play for a winning team, helping keep the Tigers in contention until the final week of the season. But once again, he came up short in the balloting.

"They told me last year I had to play on a contender," Fielder said. "Now Cal Ripken plays on a sixth-place team and they tell me he's an MVP. It's a shame. It's a shame the way things go down. I understand Cal might have been the MVP. I'm not saying he didn't have that kind of season, but he played with a sixth-place team."

"It's a joke as far as I'm concerned. The way things were done this year, I'm just done with it. If anybody put together two years like I did, they'd be MVP. So it's just a bunch of garbage."

Ripken addressed the media at the Orioles' new stadium, which is to open next April. But the focus of the occasion was 1991, and he said winning the MVP award was a wonderful final chapter in what has been a dream year.

"It was storybook-type season," he said. "It seemed that when I was out in the field, I could do no wrong. Very rarely do you have that feeling as an athlete. I hope I can experience that again, but I don't know."

Ripken's consecutive games streak is up to 1,572 — second-longest in baseball history behind Lou Gehrig's 2,130 — but this year he proved he is more than merely an iron man.

Ripken's 34 homers made him the eighth player in major league history to hit at least 20 homers in each of his first 10 full seasons. Banks is the only other shortstop to hit .300 with 30 homers and 100 RBIs.

Ripken earned a $100,000 bonus on top of his $2.2 million salary. Joe Carter got a $50,000 bonus added to his $3 million salary for finishing fifth.

Ripken is only the third player in baseball history to capture an MVP award as a member of a losing team.

Cats programs net 4 recruits

Altman signs Nike All-Star Camp recruit Lewis, Roberson

From staff and wire reports

Three K-State programs received their first NCAA letters of intent of the early-signing period Tuesday from recruits who chose to play for the Wildcats next season.

Men's basketball coach Dana Altman announced the signing of Kevin Lewis, a 6-foot-9, 210-pound center from Midwest City, Okla. Lewis averaged 18 points and 13 rebounds per game during his junior season at Carl Albert High School. He participated in the Nike All-Star Camp for the top high school prospects in the country.

Carl Albert coach Patrick Cudjoe praised Lewis' all-around ability.

"Kevin runs the floor and has excellent shooting touch and form," Cudjoe said. "He has tremendous agility and jumping ability for a 6-9 player. He's a team player, very coachable and places an emphasis on being a good person."

Lewis also considered Oklahoma, Oklahoma State, Tulsa, Temple and USC.

"The coaching staff stayed with me the whole way and was willing to work with me right away," Lewis said. "Coach Altman is behind me all the way and has a real positive personality."

The Manhattan Mercury reported that Jerrell Roberson, a 6-8 forward from Greenville, Miss., has signed with K-State. Altman would not confirm Roberson's signing on Tuesday because the letter of intent had not arrived in Manhattan.

Roberson, who weighs 225 pounds, averaged 19 points and 14 rebounds for Weston High School.

Women's basketball coach Susan Yow reported the signing of Stacy Neal, a 5-5 guard from Winfield, Nea, a Class 5A all-state selection the past two seasons, averaged 14 points, four steals and seven assists per game last season for the Vikings.

"I was real impressed with her demeanor on the court," Yow said. "She has a presence about her on the floor and is very team oriented."

Neal was the Ark Valley League player of the year last season and recently placed 25th in the state high

NCAA dashes K-State bowl hopes

MANHATTAN (AP) — The NCAA has rejected Kansas State's request for a waiver of a rule that will bar the Wildcats from a bowl game at the conclusion of what could be its best season in more than a half-century.

The rule stipulates that a team must have six victories against Division I schools. Kansas State, 6-4, will have just five victories against the top-division schools if it beats Oklahoma State this weekend — but seven victories would be the most since 1934.

Athletic director Milt Richards said Tuesday that a delegation from the school, including a representative of the Kansas attorney general, met with NCAA officials Nov. 13 to request a waiver. He said they discussed various issues, including the fact that Kansas State was unable to cancel a contract with a Division I-AA school which had been signed before the effective date of the rule.

"We appreciate the NCAA for understanding Kansas State's situation, and I believe we have exposed some problems with the rule shared by some members of the special events committee and several Division I-A and I-AA institutions," Richards said.

Views differ on fraternity branding

Tradition is individual's choice, not hazing or pledging procedure

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

The scars the hot wire left in his arm are fading slowly.

Jim Thompson, sophomore in business administration and Kappa Alpha Psi vice president, puts cocoa butter on the "K A Psi" brand everyday.

The artist's hand had shaken when he branded Thompson, leaving a disfigured design on his upper left arm. Thompson said he is waiting patiently for the scars to disappear enough for him to get branded the right way — with an iron, not a wire.

Being branded is the individual's choice in all black greek organizations in K-State's Panhellenic Council and is not a hazing or pledging procedure, said Panhellenic Adviser Tony Williams.

He said branding is an obscure part of the black greek system.

"Many times traditions start at black institutions, and long after those schools have dropped the traditions, the fraternities at predominately white campuses are still clinging to them because that's their link to the black institutions," Williams said.

Branding is not consistent with the aims and goals of the Panhellenic system, he said.

Kappa Alpha Psi's branding tradition began as a tribal custom in Africa. Leaders were branded to show power and accomplishment. It was also part of religious beliefs, according to Thompson and William Price, junior in sociology and Kappa Alpha Psi president.

Neither knew exactly why or how the tradition began, but both said it is not related to branding slaves in the 1800s.

Williams said its origin is probably the scarification practiced by African tribes depicted in the movie "The Color Purple."

"I find the idea (branding to remember slavery) difficult to understand," Williams said. "How would that make me a better person by being branded? I really question that."

Williams said no one knew why or when branding began or even which fraternity started it, but he attributed it to someone spontaneously deciding to try it.

"The brand is a milestone, and it is a part of you. It shows you're not a part of a fraternity, but that the fraternity is part of you."

William Price

However, Omega Psi Phi is most often associated with branding. All four of K-State's Omega members are branded. Williams said when people discuss branding, they most often think of Omega.

"It probably originated out of someone's idea that 'This would be neat,'" Williams said. "It is dramatic enough that it got adopted and became a tradition."

Though the branding is done by fraternity members, Price and Thompson said there are no ceremonies accompanying the "hit" (branding), and it is not a form of hazing.

Price bears a "K" inside of a diamond on his upper arm. He got the brand at the Black Student Union Big Eight Conference. Pledging has since been abolished.

"Pledging does a lot to you, and through various tests, you come to understand yourself," Price said.

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

Omega Psi Phi fraternity member Barrett Brooks, freshman in arts and sciences, shows a brand made on his chest by fraternity brothers. The branding tradition of K-State's black greek system is not considered a form of hazing or pledging. Each member decides if he wants to be branded.

He said he hopes to add another to his other arm or his chest.

"The brand is a milestone, and it is a part of you," he said. "It shows you're not a part of the fraternity, but that the fraternity is part of you."

"It's just the anticipation of the heat that's bad," said Price, who received his brand from an iron similar to one used to brand livestock.

Reginald McGowan, educational personal progress director and Alpha Phi Alpha member, said about half of black fraternity men in the nation have brands.

Herman Johnson, president of the Kansas City chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and member of a black fraternity, said he had never heard of the tradition.

Williams said Johnson's comment reflected the new Panhellenic policies that outlaw pledging and do not sanction branding.

"The concept of branding can have positive or negative meanings," Williams said. "If you talked to 20 different people with brands, you'd have 20 different reasons they did it."

Nashville schools close due to flu

By the Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The city's 67,400 school children got the rest of the week off Tuesday because of a flu outbreak that kept a quarter of them home sick the day before.

"As far as anyone knows, this is the first time ever that the entire school system has closed for medical reasons," said Eugene Deitz, director of communications for the Metro Nashville schools.

Schools in Nashville reported as many as 40 percent of their students absent Monday. Districts in surrounding counties also had high absentee rates. Humphreys County, 50 miles west, also closed schools for the rest of the week.

School officials hope the four-day closure will allow time for the flu, a strain called Type A Beijing flu, to run its course.

"If we bring them back to school this Thursday or Friday, it increases the chances of it flaring up and transmitting again," said Fredia Wadley, health director for the school system. "Four days plus the weekend — that should be long enough."

Teachers also were stricken. Schools requested 304 substitute teachers on Monday, but only 197 of the system's 400 substitutes were available, said Mary Parks, who coordinates substitute teachers.

Parks said 107 classrooms went unsupervised, and some job-seekers she interviewed Monday morning went to work as substitutes that afternoon.

"I've never had to do this before," she said.

The four days off will be considered snow days. The system has 10 snow days built into the school year.

Poverty in the Little Apple

Area residents suffer from hunger daily

Three tiers of problem described by United Way

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

People are going hungry in Manhattan.

A trip to area pantries suggest the frustrations directors of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, United Way and the American Red Cross have. There are grocery bags and boxes full of black-eyed peas, popped corn probably left over from someone's concession stand, plain canned green beans and corn, macaroni, day-old bread, near-rotten produce and fruit swarming with flies.

A volunteer working at the Red Cross last month said the day had been busy with 25 baskets of food going out. The clients she saw were young, single or single parents.

There are three tiers of hunger in Manhattan, said Glenda Gilpin, executive director of United Way. The bottom tier consists of those people who have no food. The next level consists of those who have a little food but need additional sources to enhance what they have, and the top tier includes those who have enough food but could use supplements, Gilpin said.

There is help for those who need it, Gilpin said. It's a system made of churches, government programs, social service organizations, volunteers and donations. Everybody plays their link in it. If one part of the system goes down, the whole system is in trouble, she said.

Beryl Adams, executive director of the American Red Cross, said the majority of individuals who seek relief from hunger are young — 25 to 35 years old. Many are single males and many are white, but there is no race that predominates, she said. The services see singles, families, students, people with only high school diplomas and people with college degrees. The only similarity is that most have low incomes or no incomes. "We see clients every day that are trying to feed a family on a salary of $300 to $1,000 a month," Adams said.

Clients seeking help usually do so after a crisis arises such as illness, job loss, sudden death or a car used for transportation to work breaks down.

They spend what money they have on their crisis or rent before using it for food, Adams said. It's more realistic they do it that way, she said.

Flint Hills Breadbasket director Atina Hanna said the local economy and job market are to blame for much of the hunger.

"It appears Manhattan doesn't have an unemployment problem because the unemployment rate is down compared to the rest of the state," Hanna said. "But if you look at the kind of jobs and the pay, something needs to be done."

A husband and wife, who asked not to be identified, said due to slow times at work they were getting vouchers from the American Red Cross weekly. He said he worked 40 hours a week on commission, and the customers hadn't been coming in lately.

After the third question the wife left the room crying.

"It hurts her pride," he said. "The last seven years she was growing up on her own and fended for herself. She's never had to do this until now. If it were just me, I would get by, but it's not just me. I've got to look out for her."

"I don't like having to come here (to the American Red Cross). When you don't have any other choices, you don't have any other choice," he said.

The first step in getting help is the American Red Cross. This social service organization assists and refers individuals to the appropriate programs based on their need and income. If applying for government aid, it usually takes six weeks to process the information, Gilpin said.

A person can die from hunger in six weeks, Adams said. Therefore they must rely on the area pantries until government help is approved.

Seven area pantries and the Salvation Army provide emergency food service to clients who have no food and can't wait six weeks. The Salvation Army issues vouchers for temporary emergency food while the churches work to provide baskets with well-balanced meals.

"As the day goes on, the idealistic baskets can't be met. In the afternoons, certain food begins to run out and the idealistic baskets become realistic baskets," Gilpin said.

Each pantry tries to provide a different variation, but the baskets contain the basics, Adams said. Gilpin said there are no potato chips, bacon or coffee. They obtain food from donations, church expenditures and the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Quantity is also sparse. Baskets provide enough food for three days of meals and then it's on to the next pantry — day after day, pantry after pantry. The portions are small. For a family of two to four, quantities are one box, one bag, one loaf and one can for most items.

The pantries supported by the community provide more food than government programs. Women, Infants and Children (WIC) and food stamps are two programs that act as supplements to enhance clients who have some food. Since certain nutrients are vital to growing children, WIC provides foods that make their diets more complete.

Poverty level up in 1991

Number of Riley County poor increased by thousands, national level by 2 million

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

The poverty level has risen in 1991, leaving two million more Americans poor.

Poverty is defined as "the lack of means of providing material needs or comforts," and thousands of people in Riley County are included in this category.

When resources are depleted and there is nowhere else to turn, poor individuals in Manhattan are able to receive help from any of several agencies in town. The process of assistance begins with poor individuals seeking help.

The Salvation Army works with the American Red Cross and Manhattan's

Social Rehabilitative Services to help those in need find resources to use in the community.

The local Salvation Army unit, open 24 hours, is operated by volunteers, and all funds allocated by the United Way go directly to the needy in Riley County. The funds provide year-round emergency assistance to those residents faced with short-term financial problems.

The Red Cross assists the poor by screening those who come in and helping them by sending them to local church pantries or by writing vouchers, depending on their needs. The vouchers are written to enable the poor to go to local merchants to obtain food or other necessities.

The Salvation Army also provides vouchers, many of which are written for prescriptions, utilities, rent, food, diapers, clothing, school supplies and other unavailable necessities. In 1991, 4,362 individuals were served.

Brower and her boyfriend lived with a friend in a housing project in Missouri before they came to Manhattan, but it became too hard for them so they decided to journey elsewhere.

Brower has spent a majority of her life in shelters and group homes. She doesn't have a high school diploma or a job. She is a victim of epilepsy and has bouts with seizures periodically. Now she is at high risk because of her pregnancy.

Brower, previously married, has struggled through the effects of being an abused spouse. She is slowly trying to put her life back together.

"The way I am and what I've become doesn't keep me from looking for anything positive having to do with life," she said. "Sometimes I get down in the dumps, and I even cry. I wish I could just hurry things up, like finding a place and getting on with life. It seems to get harder every day."

Brower and her boyfriend plan to get married before her child is born. She said this is what keeps her going. Her eyes lightened and she giggled when talking about a blue satin dress she plans to wear. She clasped her hands together and smiled.

"What keeps me going is the love I have for my boyfriend and the love he returns to me," she said. "I carry it with me wherever I go."

Brower is working on her GED, the equivalent of a high school diploma. With the help of the programs at the shelter, she is able to get the help she needs.

FACTS ON POVERTY

- Kansas poverty populations grew from 239,000 persons in 1979 to 281,000 in 1987. Of all fifty states, Kansas had the 7th fastest rate.
- If Kansas follows national trends, 97,313 of the 427,635 Kansas children under 12 are hungry or at risk of being hungry. Kansas serves only 45,000 of 65,000 persons eligible for state money.
- Nationwide, there has been a 300 percent increase in the use of emergency food services since 1986.

"My grandparents were my source of peace," she said. "My grandpa was a preacher and I used to help him in church on Sundays. I've always known that you should live your life by the Ten Commandments no matter who you are, homeless or not," she said, staring blankly at some chimes hanging from the porch.

Local churches feed hungry

Five congregations work together to help needy, stop hunger, ensure health

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan's churches are feeding the hungry with their available resources.

Five churches in Manhattan work together to supply the needy with a nutritionally balanced selection of food created to stop hunger and ensure health.

Manhattan's church pantries consist of foods donated by the members or funds provided for this need. The process of collecting food is different for each church, but they all try to maintain a full pantry at all times.

The food provided is allocated for three days at a time, and the amount is determined by family size. Food is blocked into categories similar to the basic food groups: protein, grains, fruits and vegetables, dairy products and miscellaneous items such as cooking oils and condiments. Peanut butter, pasta, tuna, canned vegetables and various boxed mixes are also available.

The church pantries conducted by First Lutheran, First Methodist, First Presbyterian, Grace Baptist and Seven Dolores Catholic churches are operated by volunteers from each church and are open from 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. and 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. Each pantry is open on a different day, Monday through Friday.

"The churches are meeting the needs of the hungry," said Glenda Gilpin, executive director of the United Way of Manhattan. "Seventy percent of the food comes from the community for the pantries and 30 percent is supplied by the (Flint Hills) Breadbasket. They balance out the community."

"We enjoy helping the community," said Margarie McKee, pantry coordinator at First Presbyterian. "It's frustrating at times but worth it. Sometimes we wonder about the elderly in the community whom we never see."

The distribution of food begins at the hands of the American Red Cross. About three years ago the Red Cross was asked to act as a screening agency for people in need of assistance. It organizes the visitors, helps fill out paperwork and sends people to the pantries.

The paperwork consists of questions about the number of family members in a household, source of income and an estimation of how long they will need help.

The average number of visitors in a day is 10, but sometimes as many as 20 people are screened in one day.

"Some people you know will be needing help for a while," said Beryl Adams, executive director of the local Red Cross office. "Many times we can identify them on a personal basis."

Adams said the Red Cross makes sure the people are referred to other agencies if they need further help. She said her office tries to encourage people to apply for food stamps and take advantage of resources and benefits available to them.

"We see a lot of people who don't have many resources," Adams said. "The average number of visitors is about 275 a month."

Although food resources are sometimes scarce, volunteers help teach people how to conserve food and make meals out of what is available. First Presbyterian conducts a cooking class on the first and last Tuesdays of the month from 6 to 8 p.m., and Seven Dolores provides a class every Thursday from 6 to 8 p.m. Beverly Brzuchalski, Riley County extension home economist, teaches the classes.

"This began last spring," she said. "It's an effort for people to stretch what food they do have. The families really enjoy themselves."

Recession's biggest effect on poor

Poverty

Manhattan Salvation Army director Sharon Landola said. "We generally give out vouchers for things that are necessities like boots for children when the weather gets worse or school supplies the children's parents are unable to supply."

When help has been given, those individuals who are still in need of assistance are usually referred to the Manhattan SRS.

The Manhattan SRS is funded by state and federal money. It is an umbrella agency, helping with human resources, such as financial, medical, protection, foster care and rehabilitation. Other services include service to the blind and child support.

Most patrons between ages 18 and 55 are eligible to receive general assistance. Among the many programs available, however, those used most often are the federally funded food stamps program and Medicaid.

Those eligible for each program must meet income requirements and have limited resources available to them.

Barbara Dunlap, chief of income maintenance at the Manhattan SRS, said a large portion of the people served are between ages 18 and 24. She said she feels the agency makes a difference, because it assists people and provides results from time to time.

"We do the best we can," she said. "We have seen a decrease in homelessness, and we continue to work with other agencies in town helping people to find resources."

She said there are problems that arise sometimes because of the cycles of poverty and signs that past generations have lived off the system.

"Although it is in the minority, there have been generations of people living off the system," Dunlap said. "Wouldn't it be better to let the community pay to educate these people, so eventually they, too, can become taxpayers, rather than living off the system?"

She said it takes from two to four years to learn a vocation or trade, and in that time, the system could recover somewhat.

"Most of the people who come here are out of resources and have tried everything possible before," she said.

Unlike larger cities where the lower class is easy to detect and define, poor individuals in Manhattan are interspersed, and residents can't see how much poverty exists.

Beryl Adams, Manhattan Red Cross director, said the recession has brought many people to their knees, forcing them to seek assistance from local agencies. She said the majority of people she sees are families with minimal resources who get caught up in the cycle of being poor and other people who have recently lost their jobs and need help until they can get back on their feet. She said these people are affected most by the recession.

"It's difficult to see the end of the cycle for some of these families," she said.

Adams said there is a percentage of families they always see, but the majority of those the Red Cross assists move out of the system within a year. Adams said, however, just because some people aren't seen or helped, it certainly doesn't mean they aren't there and in need of assistance.

"Solving immediate problems is our goal," Adams said. "At times, it's hard to deal with families that share a multitude of problems, but we take it one step at a time."

Adams said it is difficult at times to leave the job and not be reminded of how much poverty exists in Manhattan. In grocery stores and other places, she said, it is easy to become aware of how limited these people are.

"As Red Cross workers, we approach each person as a human being, they are no different than us — we're all the same," Adams said. "Our attitude is that we are here to provide a service, a help. We know the resources available to these people and it's our job to find them assistance to the best of our ability."

walking late at night and I would ask where she'd been. She'd say on the post with some friends, but never say who."

Mary Geiger said she had not seen Phillis Geiger since Nov. 3.

"She left that Sunday and just said she was going to Las Vegas with some friends," Mary Geiger said. "But my daughter said she saw her Friday at JC bar. No one saw her after that that I know of."

Mary Shaw, Phillis Geiger's cousin, said she had not seen Phillis Geiger for a week or two and did not know why Phillis Geiger would be at Fort Riley.

"I can't discuss that," she said. Both women said they were worried about Phillis Geiger's whereabouts, but a missing person report was not filed.

"We were just calling different places where she hangs out. Before we contacted the authorities, we wanted to give her a while to get back," Mary Geiger said. "Sometimes she would leave and not come back for a while, usually two or three days."

Shaw said she did not know if Phillis Geiger had a job.

"She said she was working, but she never seemed to get paid. She said she worked at some bar, Riverside or JC, I don't know," Shaw said.

Mary Geiger said Phillis Geiger said she had a job at a bar in Junction City at one time, but quit.

"She kept going out at night and I would say, 'Are you still working?' and she said she ain't working nowhere now," Mary Geiger said.

Mary Geiger said she had only met one of Phillis Geiger's friends.

"One man came over one time and watched videos with me and her. His name was Charles, but I don't know what. I think he was from Fort Riley," she said.

Shaw said Phillis Geiger and her father came from El Paso, Texas, for a family visit in late June before the father left for an Army assignment in Korea. Instead of going back to El Paso, where Phillis Geiger's mother lives, Phillis Geiger decided to stay in Junction City.

Economics majors may face changes in curriculum

Department waits for Faculty Senate approval of proposal

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

If a proposal to Faculty Senate is approved, economics majors will have to meet some minimum standards, said Jim Ragan, head of the department.

"We want to make sure an economics degree conveys a certain level of expertise," Ragan said.

He said the value of the degree will ultimately go up.

One part of the change requires graduate students to receive a grade of C or higher in Intermediate Macroeconomics and Intermediate Microeconomics. Currently, a graduate student would just have to pass the classes.

Also, a student will have to either receive a C or better in all other 500-level or higher economics courses, or have a grade point average of at least a 2.5 GPA in all economics courses taken to satisfy degree requirements. Roger Trenary, instructor of economics, said there are not enough requirements like these on campus. The University only requires a student to have a 2.0 GPA overall.

Trenary said he initiated the proposal so economics majors would be required to display a minimum competency in the field.

The Arts and Sciences Senate voted favorably on the proposal, but it has not yet been approved by Faculty Senate. If approved, the curriculum change will go into effect in January.

"It would not affect people who are currently in the program," Ragan said.

Ragan said students who previously graduated in economics with below a 2.5 GPA were calling themselves economists, but he doesn't think a student who makes D's is adequately trained.

He said the new requirements would encourage employers to hire K-State economics graduates, because they would know the graduates are well-qualified.

English department revamping

Effort to reflect new ideas and teaching methods result of 4-year process

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

The English department is in the process of updating and restructuring its curriculum.

The changes are an effort to more accurately reflect new ideas and methods in teaching, head of the English department Dean Hall said.

This is the culmination of a four-year process, Hall said. The main incentive for the curriculum review was the department's loss of its Ph.D. program.

"The other thing we were looking at is what do we now offer that is perhaps out of date, what should we be offering that's new," Hall said.

The department will offer a master's degree in cultural studies.

"Looking at things that are going on in literary theory, we realized there was a need for our students to have a cultural studies approach that they could choose," Hall said.

This includes studies in feminism, cross-culturalism and political analysis. The department broke down courses by area rather than offering specific courses by name, which allows for greater flexibility, Hall said.

For example, the department will offer a readings or topics course in 19th century American literature, rather than separate courses in Tennyson, Hawthorne and Whitman, Hall said.

"Depending on the flexibility we need each semester and who's available to teach, we can plug in these different things," Hall said. "In addition, there were courses on the books that we no longer had the faculty to teach."

"It's basically a reassessment of what we are as a department—looking at what will make our students well trained in all the disciplines," Hall said.

The changes are scheduled to take effect in January. See ENGLISH Page 12

Drug war harmful

Dennis supports legalization, says laws invade rights

LORI BERRY
Collegian Reporter

Richard Dennis said America's war on drugs is doing more harm than good.

During his speech to about 250 people in the K-State Union Forum Hall Tuesday night, Dennis rallied support for drug legalization.

Dennis is a former commodities trader who made his first million by the time he was 25 but quit the market a few years ago to put his energy into the public policy issue he said he believes is most worthy.

"The drug war threatens a lot of what I love about this country," Dennis said. "We're losing the soul of America in an attempt to save it."

Dennis said he thinks drug laws invade personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution. He said drug use is a victimless crime, and Americans have the right to do things that are "wrong" if they don't harm another person.

"Intrusive and harsh drug laws can be more harmful than the substances themselves," he said.

Dennis said he thought the high rate of imprisonment for drug crimes is one of the problems the country faces.

"Is it the drugs, or is it the fact that they're illegal that causes the crime?" he asked.

A big problem is that so-called drug warriors are hating the sinner instead of the sin, he said.

The most common complaint against drug legalization is that drug use would increase. Dennis estimated an initial 25 percent jump in users, but said there would be a trade-off that might actually result in less drug use.

People who do drugs because they're illegal would obviously stop using, he said. The groups most likely in that category are kids who are targeted by pushers, pushers who profit from the black market, impoverished

Although just three of five pairs of instruments are needed for flight, managers wanted all to be working, he said.

The two bad instruments recorded 24 errors within three hours, and "it was getting worse," said Hal DiRamio, a system manager for Boeing Space Transportation. The $50 million satellite booster is made by Boeing Defense and Space Group near Seattle.

Officials said they want to understand why the unit failed before sending up the satellite with a repaired booster. The satellite itself appeared to be fine, they said.

Gregory, pilot Terence "Tom" Henricks and one or two other astronauts planned to return to Johnson Space Center in Houston later this week. The rest of the crew planned to stay at Kennedy Space Center until the next launch attempt.

The crew's main job during the 10-day flight is release of the Defense Support Program satellite, designed to warn the Pentagon of enemy missile launches and nuclear explosions. After being dropped overboard 224 miles above Earth, the satellite is to be propelled into a 22,300-mile-high orbit.

It is not the first time there has been trouble with the booster's navigation unit. Repairs were needed before a 1989 shuttle launch, DiRamio said.

The satellite rocket has been used for nearly a decade to boost military and communications satellites as well as planetary probes carried into low orbit by shuttles.

The countdown for the sixth and final shuttle flight of the year was going smoothly until the satellite rocket trouble struck. The only concern had been the threat of rain.

Mission managers scrubbed the flight about 10 a.m., or nine hours before the scheduled 6:51 p.m. EST liftoff.

Legal

Dennis said the strongest claim the drug warriors have is the support of the American public. Since the public motivates legislators, the hope of legalization in the near future is grim. Dennis said his current goal is to change educated public opinion.

The danger of drug use is another point drug warriors emphasize. But, Dennis said six million people violate a U.S. drug law every day, and laws can only be effective if they defer the offensive behavior.

When so many people violate a law, he said, there is no respect for it.

Dennis also said the drug war in itself is a hopeless battle. "The drug war is a disaster," he said. "The drug lords are indestructible."

Although Dennis said he does not think drug legalization will happen soon, there are two issues which are currently gaining support.

One is the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes. The other would allow private organizations to supply clean needles to addicts to reduce the occurrence of AIDS.

"It's essentially a reorganization," said Frank Douglas, graduate student in English and president of the Student Association of Graduates in English.

There might be a class called Readings in an Author, Douglas said. Then, depending on in which semester it was offered, it would be called Readings in an Author: Chaucer, or Readings in an Author: Shakespeare, he said.

"Instead of having a class in Chaucer or a class in Shakespeare, those classes would be offered under the same number and would change from semester to semester, depending on who was teaching them and what author they were considering."

Much of the restructuring is a result of faculty changes.

"We have had a huge turnover in the last three years," Hall said.

About a third of the faculty has had to be replaced. Retirement of senior full professors is the primary reason for this, Hall said.

"Obviously, what's going on is that in the 40 years between those two degrees being obtained, these people are studying different things. Part of what this does is to reflect these newer trends," he said. "It's a way of revitalizing and keeping current."

"Part of it was to meet the provost's guidelines that the catalog was too thick — that it should actually reflect what we do," Hall said. "We cut out several pages. If every department did that, the catalog would be cheaper to print."

Fees

Part of the money for the project is allocated for student help that could monitor the labs during the evening hours, but Rathbone said he was unsure if the labs could remain open 24 hours.

"To get a player of Stacy's caliber out of the state is very important for us," Yow said.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark announced the signing of a local product, pitcher Jake Voos. Voos posted a 3.04 ERA and struck out 42 batters in 46 innings for Manhattan High School last season. Voos quarterbacked the Indian football team to a 6-2 record and the 1-70 League championship this season.

"That is something that I want you to think about," he said.

The equipment fee, which was voted on and passed by students in the college during the spring semester, resulted in a $100 additional fee charged to each engineering student during fee payment.

The money collected from the fee is divided in half, with half of the money going to the dean's office and the other half being divided equally among the departments.

The exception to this is the engineering technology program, which is being gradually phased out in Manhattan and moved to the Salina campus.

"They get all of the money that their students contribute," Rathbone said.

The equipment purchased with money from engineering technology students graduating at K-State before the program is phased out will remain on the Manhattan campus after the program moves to the Salina campus, Rathbone said.

Students and faculty said they had mixed feelings about the fee.

Dan Waldeck, senior in mechanical engineering, said students in engineering are concerned about how other funding would be affected by the fee.

"I know that doors are opening with this money, but we're trying to make sure that doors aren't closing," Waldeck said. "I think it's important to make sure all of the money that is being taken in is not being taken out by cuts from the state and University."

Mike Drescher, senior in mechanical engineering, said he agreed with Waldeck.

"We also realize that monies are tight," Drescher said. "That was one of the reasons for implementing the fee to start with."

Hermann Donnert, professor in nuclear engineering, said the fee was necessary for the college.

Philosophically, I think that we shouldn't have the fee because the state should pay for it, Donnert said.

"From a practical angle, we have some responsibilities to maintain accreditations for our engineering programs," Donnert said.

Woman's death remains mystery

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The cause of death for a woman found Sunday at Fort Riley is still being investigated after a preliminary autopsy proved inconclusive.

Phyllis Geiger, 19, had been dead one to two weeks and was found by an unidentified soldier in a wooded area near Breakneck Lake at the post. There were no obvious signs of foul play, such as a gunshot or knife wound.

Although results of the autopsy were expected to be released Wednesday, an official from Fort Riley's Criminal Investigation Division said it would take several weeks before the exact cause and manner of death are disclosed.

The official said there were no suspects in the case, and the CID is continuing an investigation.

Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer, said the pathologist was having trouble determining the cause of death.

"She was out there for some time," he said.

Mary Shaw, Geiger's cousin, said Geiger had identification on her and that is how the CID knew who to call to identify the body.

Michael Finnegan, professor of anthropology, said he is not familiar with the Geiger case but is sometimes consulted to determine the causes of death in hard cases.

Bush approves food aid for USSR

$1.5 billion OK'd to support Soviets through rough winter

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON—President Bush approved an additional $1.5 billion in food aid for the Soviet Union on Wednesday and for the first time gave assistance directly to Soviet republics.

The aid is intended to help the disintegrating country cope with food shortages over the winter. Even so, there were warnings in Congress of famine and political disintegration that threaten control of the Soviet Union's nuclear arsenal.

Intelligence sources likened the current atmosphere in the Soviet Union to that of the dismal 1930s and said there was a potential for anarchy if food shortages spread during the winter.

With the latest installment, the United States has committed itself to $4 billion in loan guarantees over the last year for Soviet purchases of American farm products.

The Soviet Union had hoped for more, seeking $2.5 billion in credit guarantees and $1 billion in humanitarian help.

Recognizing the breakup of the Soviet central government, Bush earmarked the new assistance both for the republics and the federal government.

Until now, Bush had been reluctant to deal with the republics out of a desire to avoid undercutting Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. However, there is a growing recognition in the administration that the central government is collapsing as the republics assert control.

The announcement came as financial experts from the seven richest Western democracies met in Moscow to discuss repayment of the Soviet Union's foreign debt, estimated at up to $100 billion. Eight republics have accepted collective responsibility for the debt but four others have refused to give an unconditional commitment, raising threats of Western economic sanctions.

On Capitol Hill, a bipartisan group of legislators said additional U.S. aid to the Soviet Union would lessen the chances of political instability and chaos.

Senators David Boren, D-Okla., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., urged that Congress and the administration put aside bickering about foreign aid so lawmakers can produce a package before adjourning for the year by Thanksgiving.

Last week, Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., and Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., were forced to withdraw a plan to spend $1 billion from this year's Pentagon budget on humanitarian and demilitarization aid to Moscow. The sagging U.S. economy has made aid to foreign governments — never popular in Congress — even less attractive.

Most worrisome to analysts are the 30,000 nuclear warheads scattered about the quarreling republics of the Soviet Union.

Lugar said he would like to devote up to $500 million to helping round up and control nuclear weapons, with similar amounts given by other western allies.

Complicating the prospect of food shortages this winter is the nearly one-third decline in Soviet grain production and the return home of 700,000 Soviet soldiers from their former outposts in Eastern Europe.

Sutherland is 60 going on 21

Years as Lebanese hostage doesn't damage spirit of educator

By the Associated Press

WIESBADEN, Germany — Thomas Sutherland said Wednesday that his 6 1/2 years as a Lebanese hostage taught him tolerance, patience and even to pity the captors who put him in chains.

The 60-year-old educator was kept in chains much of the time after his Beirut kidnapping on June 9, 1985, beaten on one occasion until he screamed and, at times, languished in a dark, underground cell.

But two days after being freed, he said that overall, he felt great, like 60 going on 21.

"I feel like I'm ready to get out of here and go charging, but when I got off of my chain finally I found that I'm a little bit wobbly on my pins."

"I could almost say it's been worth waiting for, but it was a heck of a long wait — 2,347 days. But it's over, thank God, and we go on from here to the rest of our lives."

He spoke to reporters at the U.S. military hospital at Wiesbaden, where he received a clean bill of health from medical officials and was reunited with his wife Jean and daughter Kit. He arrived in Wiesbaden on Tuesday.

Sutherland said he believed the remaining Western hostages, including Americans Terry Anderson, Joseph Cicippio and Alann Steen, would be released in the near future.

Both Sutherland and Briton Terry Waite said after their release Monday that their captors told them the Americans would soon be freed.

Sutherland, kidnapped while working as dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut, said his ordeal has changed him.

"I've learned a great deal of tolerance. I've learned an enormous amount of patience. I've never spent three hours sitting on my duff against a wall just waiting for someone to decide what the next move is."

He said he came to pity the hostage holders, because they don't appreciate how heinous the thing is that they are doing.

Sutherland talked about the worst part of his imprisonment.

"After about a year and a half, they put us in a very bad situation — individual cells underground, very little light. I was very depressed."

"And they'd come in and bring the food in and then leave me to eat in the dark. Try it some time. It's not much fun."

He said he was once beaten by his captors.

"I was a bad boy once so they gave me a biffing. I asked for it, I guess. I disobeyed their rules."

Bush's campaign finances plentiful

Democrats begin fund-raising; GOP goal set at $30 million

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush and Vice President Dan Quayle were hosting a Republican gala Wednesday night expected to boost their 1992 campaign bankroll above $5 million, more than all of the Democratic presidential hopefuls combined.

The president's popularity has been sliding in the polls as increasing numbers of Americans signal their discontent with his handling of the U.S. economy and other domestic matters.

However, Bush's campaign finance numbers are right on target, with Wednesday's $1,000-a-plate banquet expected to net another $500,000. That brings to more than $5 million the amount Bush and Quayle have raised in just a handful of events since kicking off their fall fund-raising blitz with a $1 million bash in Houston three weeks ago.

The Democrats aren't anywhere close. The major candidates together had raised just $2.1 million through Sept. 30, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Though the Democrats have been concentrating their energies on fund raising in recent weeks, none have the president's ability to rake in huge amounts of cash in one setting.

"What it shows you is the power of incumbency," said Peggy Connolly, a spokeswoman for the campaign of former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas.

Money's not everything, Connolly added.

"The Republicans are sort of like the bully who flexes his muscle. It doesn't mean he's really the toughest guy in town," she said. "Money is an important factor, but I think the sentiment of voters is such that money isn't going to buy anyone."

Tsongas, the first major Democrat to enter the race, had raised the most as of the last FEC report, with $767,000. Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa was next, with $714,000 raised through Sept. 30th.

Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey followed with $224,000, then Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder with $220,000 and Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton with $201,000. Former California Gov. Jerry Brown had not announced yet.

Charles Black, a Republican consultant, said the Bush-Quayle fund-raising events so far have performed, if anything, over projections. Wednesday's banquet was the fourth big fund-raising dinner. Besides the Houston kickoff, there were events in Dallas and New York.

Black said the president's fund-raising prowess has not been damaged by his slipping popularity.

"Most of his supporters are people who have been with him for years and years," he said. The sour economy means some of the businessmen aren't doing as well, but most of them are able to come up with a contribution for him."

The Bush re-election campaign, which the president has not officially established yet, hopes to raise $30 million by next spring from campaign contributions and federal matching funds. That's the maximum amount a candidate can spend on the primary election campaign.

Black said that by raising his $30 million early, the president gains two major advantages.

"If you can get your money in the bank, you've got tactical flexibility," Black said.

Plus-minus grading system favored by faculty, students

K-State junior pushes for proposal's implementation, removal of straight system

DEDRA MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

K-State's grading scale has been getting a lot of attention lately.

Carol Schoenbachler, junior in speech, took a proposal to Student Senate today to present the plus grading system.

Schoenbachler, former student at Michigan State University, said she is not pleased with the grading system at K-State.

"I surprised by the fact K-State used a straight system," Schoenbachler said. "I felt it was unfair to students because it wasn't an accurate reflection of their work."

Schoenbachler said she understands the issue has been brought up several times in the past 20 years, but a plus-minus grading system could make students work harder. The current system does not allow students who put forth extra effort in a class to receive full rewards, she said.

"I would like to recommend a system that would not only be more equitable to the students but would also allow the instructor the opportunity to give an accurate evaluation of the student's performance," Schoenbachler said.

Five universities in the Big Eight Conference use the straight scale.

"The advantage of the straight system is that it gives the instructors few options to choose from when grading, which makes it easier and there is no need to change software," Schoenbachler said.

She said the disadvantage is that the students and instructors deserve more options when receiving and giving grades, and grade point averages are lower on the straight scale.

Iowa State University, University of Colorado, and University of Kansas use the plus/minus scale. KU is the only Big Eight school to use both the straight and plus/minus system.

"The advantage of having the plus/minus system is it will give an accurate appraisal of students' work, and the instructors will have more options," Schoenbachler said.

Same grades, different GPA

Here is an example of how one set of grades is figured in different systems, producing different GPAs.

Straight system (current)	Plus-minus system (alternative)	Plus system (proposed)
A = 4.0 C = 2.0 B = 3.0 B = 3.0	A = 4.0 C+ = 2.3 B+ = 3.3 B = 2.7	A = 4.0 C+ = 2.5 B+ = 3.5 B = 3.0
GPA = 3.0 12.0	GPA = 3.07 12.3	GPA = 3.25 13.0

Bad boy Billy Idol charged in battery

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) — Rock star Billy Idol was charged Tuesday with punching a woman in the face after a dinner date, officials said.

Idol was to surrender Wednesday to face misdemeanor assault and battery charges, officials said. An arraignment also could be set for Wednesday.

Deputy District Attorney Mark Vezzani said Idol attacked the woman, Amber Nevel, on Oct. 11 after Idol and a friend met her and another woman at a West Hollywood restaurant.

The women told sheriff's deputies they offered to drive the men to their car after dinner. They said Idol began shouting at Nevel and hit her in the mouth and forehead, Vezzani said.

KBI investigating Winfield rape case

WINFIELD, Kan. (AP) — The rape of a severely handicapped, mentally retarded female patient at Winfield State Hospital was being investigated by the state's welfare department and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

The patient is six months pregnant. In a Wednesday memo to employees that was obtained by the Winfield Courier, Superintendent Tony Lybarger said the records of all 167 female patients at the hospital were being checked to see if any other women might be pregnant.

"Some man has imposed degradation and hurt on a woman who could neither consent to his advances nor defend herself," Lybarger's memo said.

"This is a tragedy for her and her family. This is a mega-tragedy for each of us," the memo said. "I am not aware of a more hurtful behavior."

Lybarger said the victim is unable to walk because of her handicaps. He said she won't be able to assist investigators.

The superintendent said he and the staff were offended by the conduct of the person who took advantage of the woman.

"And we want to know who that individual was," he said.

Learning disabilities

MIKE VENSO/Staff

Christie Endsley, junior in apparel design, has a learning disability which makes the reading of textual information difficult. Because of her disability, Endsley was told in high school not to go to college — instead she chose to face the challenges and has maintained a 3.0 GPA.

Student meets challenges of misunderstood limitation

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Learning disabilities can take many forms, and for students affected by them, they can make academic progress frustrating.

Christie Endsley, junior in apparel design, started noticing problems in the third grade. She had a tendency to fidget and talk to herself, and sometimes she was a distraction to the class.

Her teacher decided to do something about it.

"She felt I wasn't working hard enough, so to make an example of me, she had me take my chair and my desk and put them in the corner," Endsley said. "Then she put up one of those large felt boards around me, and I had to stay there for three weeks, until the principal found out."

"You can imagine what the other kids thought of me then," she said. "Because of that experience, I decided this is something I shouldn't have to hide, and I don't want to be treated like this."

Students with learning disabilities comprise the fastest growing group of disabled students at K-State. Services for Students with Physical Limitations provides a wide range of support services for these students.

It has gone from working with one or two students with learning disabilities in the early 1980s to more than 150 students now. Adults with documented learning disabilities have the same rights as those with physical disabilities under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

Learning disabilities can manifest itself in several ways. Students with learning disabilities may have deficits in reading, writing, oral, mathematical, organizational or social skills.

They may show one or more of several common characteristics — slow reading rate or poor comprehension and retention, a slowness at writing and spelling, an inability to concentrate on and comprehend oral language, a consistent tendency to transpose numbers or letters, difficulty starting and completing tasks and difficulty in following oral and written directions.

Endsley said she tried to hide the fact that she had a reading problem, which is something many people do.

"The sad thing is that with a learning disability, people isolate themselves," she said. "They don't want to talk about it, like they are inferior or inadequate. As soon as people hear that you are learning disabled, they automatically think your IQ drops."

People with learning disabilities are not slow learners. Many of them are of above average intelligence.

"We have a number of students involved here who are considered to be in the gifted range," said Gretchen Holden, director of Services for Students with Physical Limitations. "That's a real edge if you are at a disadvantage with a learning disability. That helps to make up for it."

People's perceptions and how they deal with learning disabled students is often as much of a problem as the disability itself, she said.

"There is a lot of misunderstanding about learning disabilities," Norma Dyck, professor of special education said. "Far too many people equate it with mental retardation. That's not what we're talking about here. A lot of people don't realize the potential many of these students have."

Students with learning disabilities are sometimes placed in special environments with more severely disabled students.

"It still makes me sad to think that the schools are putting these students in with the retarded and the special education students," Endsley said. "So they are automatically categorized as having a lower IQ, and they do not. Most of them have higher IQs."

More and more people are coming to college well prepared as learning disabled students. In the past, students were reluctant to admit a learning disability.

"We used to get students that were flunking out and dragging in when Yugoslavian war still continuing

Mass destruction awaits citizens hiding underground in cellars

By the Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia — Hundreds of sick and wounded crept from cellars to be evacuated from Vukovar on Wednesday, and the head nurse at the hospital said as many as 1,000 people died in the three-month siege of the city.

As they were led through the shattered ruins of a once-graceful town on the Danube, the wounded endured horrifying glimpses of carnage wrought by the offensive, which ended over the weekend when the city's Croatian defenders gave in to the Serb-dominated federal army.

There were claims of atrocities — including one report, which could not be independently confirmed, that 41 children were slain.

Even as guns fell silent in Vukovar, Serb commanders there vowed to push on to Osijek, capital of the eastern province of Slavonia and a city of 140,000 people. Osijek, 20 miles northwest of Vukovar, has been shelled constantly for three months. Five people died there Wednesday, Croatian news media said.

The head nurse at Vukovar hospital, Ljubica Lavrenic, said the hospital recorded 500 dead and buried in Vukovar. "But at least another 500 likely died and are unaccounted for," she told a reporter in Sremska Mitrovica, a Serbian town where a covered sports stadium has been turned into a refugee shelter.

Sister Mladena, a nun who helped care for the wounded, said many children died because of lack of adequate medicine and treatment during the siege.

"Many of them died of gangrene," she said. "We couldn't sterilize anything, everything was overcrowded."

Previous reports from around Croatia have put the death toll in 4 1/2 months of war at something like 5,000.

Around Vukovar, hundreds of bodies, some with eyes gouged out or limbs hacked with axes, littered the streets. Much of the city has been leveled by the fighting.

"This is terrible. Unbelievable," one patient said while being loaded into an ambulance on a stretcher.

Croatian officials in Zagreb charged that some of the sick and wounded were arrested by the army before they could be evacuated. That report couldn't be confirmed, but some of the refugees in Sremska Mitrovica said young men had been separated from the group and taken away.

Thousands of people fled Vukovar, a mixed Serb-Croat city of 40,000. Unconfirmed reports of atrocities have surfaced since the city's surrender.

A photographer, Goran Mikic, said the corpses of 41 ethnic Serbian children were found in plastic bags in a school in neighboring Borovo Naselje. But an Associated Press photographer who tried to reach the scene was prevented from doing so by army troops who cordoned off the area.

The Croatian government later released a statement sharply questioning the report, noting the photographer had failed to take photographs of the bodies and that the army prevented other journalists from reaching the site.

Both sides have frequently claimed massacres in the war, but it is often difficult or impossible to confirm the reports.

A European Community spokesman said 19 ambulances and 20 buses loaded with patients left Vukovar bound for Sremska Mitrovica, a Serbian town near Belgrade. About 60 of the 400 sick and wounded remained behind, apparently too weak to travel.

Officials had planned to evacuate the wounded, mostly Croats, to other towns in Croatia, but that was deemed unsafe due to continued fighting in the area.

Thousands of people have died in battles since Croatia declared independence from Yugoslavia on June 25.

After taking Vukovar earlier in the week, the army captured the hospital, and Croatian and army negotiators declared it a "neutral area" under the auspices of the International Red Cross.

A cease-fire held Wednesday around the hospital, said the EC spokesman, Ed Koestel. But he said EC teams reported seeing empty ambulances and buses coming under fire while heading toward Vukovar. It was not clear who was shooting at them.

Army and Croatian officials met in Zagreb, the Croatian capital, to decide on the route of the evacuation vehicles, which will be accompanied by EC monitors, Koestel said.

The army and Serb militants appeared almost totally in control of the eastern Croatian town, which fell over the weekend after a three-month siege.

Fort Riley expansion plans not expended

There was a time not long ago when Kansans were worried Fort Riley was going to expand, and country and city folks banded together to keep farms from being taken over by arms.

Then the war came.

The various groups that opposed the expansion of the fort got caught up in the political correctness of supporting the troops and said they would be quiet while the Army went off to fight Saddam Hussein.

The war is over now, and little has been heard about the expansion of Fort Riley. Nary a cry of "We need a bigger training center for our death squads" has been whined from Fort Riley officials or the Pentagon since we pulled out of Desert Storm.

The reason for this comes mostly from a moratorium the Department of Defense placed on land expansions before the war started. Silence is golden, but when it comes from the government, it's of which to be wary.

Since the war ended, an undesignated number of troops that weren't here before the war has been relocated to Fort Riley. Most of these men and women came from Europe where King George has pulled out also, this time from the Great Red Menace.

There is a certain hint that perhaps somebody behind a green curtain somewhere is thinking, "We need more land in Fort Riley."

Fort Riley is short of land — this is true. There are options, however, to expansion.

Simulators can be used more effectively. Desert Storm showed we have the technology. Another option is to take the troops to other bases when they need to train extensively. Take them to California, like they've done before, or Texas, where bases have closed. All we need is the commitment from the government to make these options work.

It's time for grassroots groups here at home to begin planning for the fight. Forewarned is forearmed. Not only because someone will soon say the post needs more land, but because now that it's PC to support the troops, anti-expansion forces will have to contend with more than the greedheads on the Manhattan and Junction City chamber of commerces.

This time, the entire country will be behind the big boys with the big tanks making big plans to make a bigger fort.

Recycled planes great idea, NASA

Kudos to NASA and the NOAA.

In this age of super-mega satellites that cost hundreds of millions of dollars, the high-tech minded NASA officials have been using (gasp) hand-me-down planes.

Most recently, the infamous U2 spy plane has been used to study the ozone layer. Also in use are the venerable DC-8 and Boeing 707 as airborne observatories.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Agency has been using World War II-era bombers to fly into hurricanes.

Though the reasons for using the older planes are probably more economic rather than the sincere belief they are the best for the job, it is still nice to see war machines being recycled into more people-friendly avenues.

Of course, millions of dollars are being saved by these programs. Hopefully, NASA and NOAA are putting that money to good use.

Perhaps it is no coincidence that a new radar capable of detecting tornadoes has been developed by a government-backed research project.

Then again, in the tradition of the cynicism fostered by years of frustration in these agencies, maybe the money is being used for another hokey super-mega satellite program. Nonetheless, thanks for recycling, guys.

A party to end all parties

$8-million system to ensure survival

Believe it or not, it was seven years ago that the made-for-TV movie "The Day After" made its debut. In it, the American people were not only warned of the consequences of nuclear war, but also the horrible effects of what happens when Jason Robards overacts.

Nonetheless, "The Day After" made a powerful statement about how horrible it would be to live in a world after nuclear attack. That is, for most of us. Unfortunately, not all.

It seems that since 1982, the U.S. government has spent $8 billion dollars on a system to ensure that certain "leaders" survive any nuclear attack. Included in the price tag is a network of bunkers and communication systems to ensure that a government can still function. (Cable is not included.)

The list of "leaders" has included such notables as Jeane Kirkpatrick, Richard Helms and others who Japanese schoolchildren know better than Americans do.

Though not listed, George Bush can probably be assumed to also be on the list since he's in charge of the program.

That's too bad. With George's new devotion to domestic affairs, you would think he would be out telling people dying of radiation sickness that the answer lies in finding funding in the private sector instead of spending public funds.

Besides, think how easy it would be to find points of light if they were glowing all of the time.

SHAWN BRUCE

The more I thought about this, the more I realized that, damnit, I deserve a bunker of my own to fill with the people I choose. So here, in no particular order, are the various people I would fill my bunker with.

My Mother. Somebody has to make sure that the all important "guilt emotion" doesn't disappear in the chaos following a nuclear strike. My mother (of "You never call unless you need money" fame) would be a prime candidate.

The Grateful Dead. Even if scientists are 99 percent sure that the Dead and cockroaches will be the only two Earth life forms to survive a nuclear attack unscathed, it's best to "make sure."

The Swedish Bikini Team. What better way to assure procreation of the species and get trashed on all the cheap beer.

My white trash friend Arkansas Dave. He's used to living in a trailer, so an underground bunker would probably be a step up.

By no means is this list all inclusive. I haven't even gotten to the supermodels, and I find myself running out of space.

For those of you who find this column stupid, I grant you that it's not exactly Mensa material.

But hey, it's no more stupid than spending $8 billion to protect leaders to rule a devastated wasteland.

And at least my column is funny.

Close your eyes and see the real world

Every day's a day to enjoy, learn from diversity

PHIL ANDERSON GUEST
Phil Anderson is a K-State speech instructor.

I reluctantly trudged into my Physics 101 class as a senior at St. Cloud State, having put off taking it for four years.

Feeling a bit out of place surrounded by first-year students, I separated myself to the back corner of the class, praying for some sort of deliverance.

The class was full, and after a few minutes elapsed, no professor arrived. The unwritten rule was that after 10 minutes past the hour, the class could leave if the professor failed to show. At precisely 10 minutes past, the class rose as one to make its escape, when just as suddenly, a figure leaped from behind the large lab desk at the front of the class, clambered to the top of it and ordered us all to sit back down. I was not alone in my stunned incredulity, and since my major was theater, even doubly so. Without daring to take our eyes off this specter, we all managed to fumble back to our seats.

"I've just demonstrated the first rule of physics," said the man in front of us. "And that is never believe what your eyes alone tell you."

your eyes alone tell you" was an especially valuable lesson because, as humans, we make most judgments based on what we see or think we see. We tend to judge by what our eyes alone tell us without benefit of deeper inquiry.

I've often wondered, if we were all blind, what kind of relationships would we establish with each other? Since we couldn't see each other, we would have to form judgments about one another in some other way. We'd have to talk to each other and discover clues about each other's character without the impediment of being able to see. It would be impossible to form quick judgments based on one's physical appearance.

And then, what would happen if, after a period of time, sight was suddenly restored to all of us? Would we be shocked to discover we had established relationships with a variety of people from various racial, ethnic and cultural backgrounds? Or would we have managed in some other way to keep ourselves separated, segregated, stratified, dysfunctional?

Human beings are fascinating because we have all been wandering about the planet in our own manner and way, and none of us has wandered about it in the same way as someone else.

Rodgers and Hammerstein wrote the musical "South Pacific" in 1949. The secondary plot involves a Lt. Cable who has fallen in love with Liat, a young Polynesian woman. Cable realizes that his proper Philadelphia family would never accept his love for Liat because of the differences in their heritage and culture. He bitterly sings the song "You've Got to be Taught." Even though the lyrics are somewhat dated, the message is unmistakably clear, although it shows its own bias:

"You've got to be taught to be afraid,
Of people whose eyes are oddly made,
Or people whose skin is a different shade.
You've got to be carefully taught."

Some loving relationships are belittled because they are outside the norm and are thus perceived as some sort of threat. And yet, what conceivable threat could there be of two individuals choosing to love one another regardless of race, sex, ethnicity, religion or whatever reason we can drum up to deny the validity of such a love?

But we all have the capacity for growth and change. Perhaps, during the coming season of thanks, we might remind ourselves that our celebration of diversity can be a continuing personal mission that doesn't begin or end with the date on a calendar.

This past week we've had the opportunity to learn more about our Asian-American heritage. In January, we are challenged once again to "recognize and address injustice through non-violent means" with the recognition of Martin Luther King Jr. Observation Week.

February is Black History Month, and later in the spring we can join in acknowledging Hispanic Awareness Month. We can also partake of the potpourri of tempting food offerings by the International Coordinating Council's annual food festival.

In a rapidly shrinking world with disappearing nation-state boundaries, there exists a growing myriad of economic tentacles fueled by the ambitions of people throughout the world. Our economic trading partners are no longer confined to Manhattan or Riley County or the United States. So, we must bother to learn all that we can about the peoples and places of the world. The baggage of bigotry is too big a handicap to lug around in this expanding world.

One day, Professor Alquist brought in a bunch of neon lights and placed the whole class in a circle putting a neon light between each of us. Everyone in the circle had the end of a neon light in each hand so the circle was unbroken. Alquist told us not to let go because he was going to plug in the two ends, run current through all our bodies and light up all of the neon lights. The plug was placed in the receptacle and each of those neon lights came on. With a mischievous grin, Alquist reminded us to not let go. We all studied each other nervously for any signs of panic while perspiration began to form in all the usual places. No one let go. The current flowed through each of us, and the neon lights stayed lit.

"You need each other now," Professor Alquist said. "We can accomplish quite a bit if we can manage to stay connected."

Eventually, I realized he was talking about much more than electricity.

Letter from friend tells of bitter war

Former Yugoslav grad student pleads for U.S. help

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Angela Lambley remembers the summer evenings she and Goran Tonkovic would go to Espresso Royale Cafe for lemonade and conversation. They talked mostly about their families, she said.

Tonkovic was a graduate student in agronomy but left K-State to go home to Yugoslavia. Lambley said she had not heard from him since then until she received a letter last week.

She met Tonkovic the summer of 1990 when they both were living in Goodnow Hall. She remembered him as a calm man who liked the Rolling Stones.

"I remember he didn't like the weather in Kansas," she said. "He thought it was too cold."

Lambley, sophomore in microbiology, said she was surprised to receive a letter from him because even though the two had exchanged addresses, they had never corresponded.

"I put off writing him for quite a while," she said. "When I finally got around to it, the war had started (in Yugoslavia), and I figured he wouldn't get the letter."

What surprised Lambley even more than receiving the letter was its contents.

The letter was not light and friendly, but serious. He briefly described the war in Yugoslavia and then appealed for help to stop the war.

"Many people do not know what is going on over here, what terrible things are happening to my people," Tonkovic wrote. "Therefore, I send a message to you. I send the truth to you. Please, tell the truth to your friends. Help to stop the war in Croatia."

Lambley said she doesn't understand the hatred toward Serbia Tonkovic expressed in his letter.

"He used to tell me the only difference between a Croat and a Serb were the two words and a language," she said.

"I'm wondering what has happened between now and then to change his mind," she said, "because in the letter, he wasn't too happy with the Serbs."

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said the basis for the war between the Serbs and Croats is the Serbs do not want their people living in Croatia.

"The idea is that the Serbs would enlarge their republic as much as possible," he said.

Hajda said the Croatian cry for help to stop the war has gone unnoticed in the United States.

"The United States has not shown any strong desire to get involved," he said.

Holidays bring depression

FONE crisis center busier during Christmas, Thanksgiving seasons

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

A season that is supposed to mean giving and receiving, time with friends and family and holiday cheer can mean depression for some people.

"Our calls definitely escalate during the winter months, especially around Christmas," said Andrea, associate coordinator of the FONE crisis center. "People feel lonely during this time of the year. They think they don't have anyone to spend time with."

Depression is usually a byproduct of stress, which can come in various forms such as death of a spouse or loved one, divorce, poor health or trouble with school, she said.

"There are eight signs of severe depression: fatigue, changes in sleep patterns, difficulty concentrating, changes in appetite, a slow-down of the body's systems, loss of interest in things that used to be important, extreme feelings of guilt and thoughts of suicide," John Robertson, psychologist for University Counseling Services said. "A person experiencing five or six of these feelings for a period of several weeks is probably suffering from severe depression."

Clinical depression, however, is a disease.

"It is considered a disability by insurance companies," said Leon Rappoport, professor in psychology. "You can collect insurance to pay for treatment of depression."

Robertson said, "Being depressed or feeling a sense of hopelessness is not uncommon, but it can still be very dangerous, with suicide being a worst-case scenario."

People suffering from depression, especially if it is severe, should seek some type of counseling, Robertson said. FONE crisis center volunteers have sources of help available for callers.

"It depends on the individual call, but I'd say we refer almost every caller to someone else for counseling. We are a crisis intervention service," she said. "We do a lot of what I call high-powered listening, and sometimes that's all they need."

Robertson and Rappoport said they agreed that counseling is one of the best methods of getting help.

The other solution is anti-depressant drugs.

"When someone is feeling severely depressed, their biochemistry is off and medication can be a helpful solution," Robertson said. "It's like if your car is off the road and stuck in a ditch, and you keep pressing the accelerator and turning the wheel — you're not going to get the car out of the ditch. Medication can help you get your car back on the road so you can drive again."

KU changes drinking policy

Rowdy behavior on hill at football games creating problems

By the Associated Press

LAWRENCE — University of Kansas officials, acting on increasing complaints about rowdy behavior at recent football games, are taking steps to crack down on excessive drinking.

The problems center on Campanile Hill, an area above the football stadium that provides a view of the playing field, making it a popular gathering point during games.

"Our basic concern is that over the last couple of football games, a small minority of individuals have been creating problems for us on the hill," said Del Shankel, the university's interim executive vice chancellor. "After the last football game ... we met to take some steps to address those concerns."

When the Jayhawks meet Missouri on Saturday in the season's final game, Shankel and David Ambler, vice chancellor for student affairs, said additional campus police will patrol the hill.

The officials also have made a change in the school's alcohol policy, hoping it will make it easier for police to control drinking.

State law prohibits alcohol consumption on university property by anyone younger than 21 but allows restricted sales and consumption of 3.2 percent cereal malt beverages to people age 21 or older.

The university's alcohol policy has stated only that the sale of cereal malt beverages is restricted to licensed spaces on campus, such as in the Kansas Union.

Stock market down again

Dow Jones begins to level off following recent sharp plunges

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — The stock market posted a small loss Wednesday, leveling off in slackened trading after its sharp drop of late.

The Dow Jones average of 30 industrials slipped 1.56 points to 2,930.01.

Declining issues outnumbered advances by about 8 to 7 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Big Board volume came to an estimated 192.68 million shares as of 4 p.m. EST against 241.38 million at the same point in the previous session.

Analysts said traders were doing some wary bargain hunting after the declines of the past few sessions, which produced a net loss of more than 130 points in the Dow Jones industrials.

They said many market participants remained uneasy over the lagging economy.

On an upbeat note that was uncharacteristic of the recent business news, the government reported a stronger than expected 7.3 percent rise in housing starts for October.

Brokers cautioned that the monthly data on the number of housing units on which work has begun are notoriously subject to short-term fluctuations.

Interest rates rose a bit in response to the news, but later reversed course to finish slightly lower on the day. Yields on long-term government bonds wound up at about 7.9 percent.

Merck jumped 6 1/8 to 145, trading at new highs and singlehandedly reducing the Dow Jones industrial average's loss by about a dozen points. The New York Times reported encouraging findings from a new study of a Merck drug for lowering cholesterol.

Bristol-Myers Squibb, which has a competing anti-cholesterol product, rose 1/4 to 81.

Shares of Merck, which has compiled a record of earnings growth that is much admired on the Street, have more than doubled since early 1990 and show a tenfold increase over the past seven years.

ERIC BROWN

Hey, it wasn't so bad

Yes, the theme of this is the American Gladiators. I'm not sure that it belongs on the sports page, but here it goes.

Although they are universally the laughing stock of all living organisms, it is worth noting that they are using a winning formula and adding a twist that may keep the "ultimate sporting event of the '90s" here to stay.

It's funny to think of the Gladiators maintaining that kind of longevity, considering they are a stale joke to 90 percent of humanity. But it should be noted that 90 percent of humanity are aware that American Gladiators exist, and that is the first tough step toward success. There are some commercial possibilities existing.

Now by no means am I a Gladiator maniac (as if I would admit it if I were), but I did go to Bramlage Tuesday to catch the awesome show. Hey, so what if I had a free ticket.

The point is that enough people are giving the Gladiators a chance, and even though it may not be fine-tuned, the Gladiators are in a position to possibly shed their adolescent aura and shift into a more respected light.

They do have several things going for them. First is the success that the World Wrestling Federation attained in the late 1980s. They jumped on to the coattails of the WWF and rode to the forefront of macho-type athletics.

The WWF was successful once with their macho programing. The broadcasts were fake and everyone knew it, but most people were still interested, as a plethora of Hulkamaniacs were aligned behind the forces of good.

The attitudes of the actors (I mean wrestlers) was such that it was impossible not to choose up sides. It proved to be more than just an overnight sensation as it raised the level of pro wrestling to a new level of publicity.

After years of WWF dominance in the spotlight, the childishness of the show along with the fake wrestling grew tiresome, and the laughter became louder. Today, the Federation is almost totally silent.

Because the American Gladiators used the pattern of the WWF, they, too, suffer from the snickers of millions. They must escape this sleeper hold or they will be short-lived.

In addition to adopting the WWF's macho atmosphere, the American Gladiators use the star effect. With names like Nitro and Gemini, the public has characters that it can link to the show.

However, using amateur challengers, the Gladiators have an innovative idea that makes Gladiators special from other such events. This allows amateur athletes to get recognition after their playing days are over, as well as providing them with motivation toward training.

In addition, it makes the event more exciting to watch.

The fact that anyone can try out gives that American dream factor to the Gladiators. Just to see all of the marshmallow-bellies that show up for the tryouts should be inspiration enough, but to see the best of them in the spotlight getting their one shot at Thunder in the joust is a much better plot than Andre the Giant against the "Macho Man" Randy Savage.

Another thing that could preserve the Gladiators is their ability to alter events. Not only can they make minor improvements in the stages, they can continually bring in new games when the old ones get boring.

This is not a prediction that Gladiators will be a success — the verdict is still unclear on that one — it is just a statement of the fact that a step has been taken. To be as widely recognized as they are is saying something. If they can sway the public away from the juvenile image that currently exists, the American Gladiators could be a force.

Different paths taken to success

Capriotti, Bietau build rosters through separate recruiting strategies

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

In your back yard or in a foreign land?

That's the question. It's one that K-State cross country coach John Capriotti and Wildcat women's tennis mentor Steve Bietau have wrestled with for the past several years.

As the K-State coaches with the longest tenures in Manhattan, Capriotti and Bietau have had ample opportunity to try several different approaches to recruiting.

The philosophies they've adopted of late would appear to be diametrically opposed. Yet the two coaches insist that they're alarmingly similar. "The ultimate thing, clearly, is to be among the top teams in the conference and among the top teams nationally," Bietau said.

Just how Capriotti and Bietau are going about getting their teams there is what differs so greatly.

Capriotti had 12 runners from the state of Kansas who competed for him this fall in cross country. Bietau, on the other hand, had five foreign tennis players who saw action for the Cats over the past three months.

Both defend the other's philosophies by pointing out that there are factors involved with their specific sports that require different approaches.

"There are things about Steve's sport that I'll never know," Capriotti said of tennis and Bietau's recruiting slant. "He's doing what he believes is best for him, and I'm doing what I feel is best for me."

A look inside the methodology employed by each would indicate that Capriotti's assessment of how the means justify the ends might be right on the money.

As the Wildcat head coach, but first as an assistant to Steve Miller, Capriotti has recruited Kansas athletes from the word go. And they've had success here. Capriotti listed pole vaulter Doug Lytle, jumper Rita Graves and distance aces Jacques Struckhoff and Janet Haskin as examples.

"To say that there isn't talent in this state would be wrong, dead wrong," Capriotti said. "A lot of people think that there aren't Division I athletes here, but Doug Lytle, Rita Graves and Janet Haskin are examples of how good our kids can be."

Capriotti has not abandoned recruiting nationally — his track and field travels take him across the country — but he believes there are a few pluses inherent with recruiting athletes in the state.

"The transition from high school to college is much easier for an athlete if he or she is doing it close to home," Capriotti said. "There's not as much risk involved."

"It's comforting knowing that your mom and dad are just a few hours away."

Capriotti has been faced with a bit of a quandary, however, in that Iowa State has become a dominant power in Big Eight men's cross country with a team dominated by foreign runners.

But even with conference dominance possibly in the balance, he has refused to budge.

"Iowa State isn't winning in cross country because they're recruiting foreign athletes," Capriotti said. "They're winning because they've got an emphasis on recruiting for distance events."

"In my mind, it would be kind of hypocritical on my part to overlook a strong Kansas kid just to have a chance — and it would be just that, a chance — to compete for a championship. This is a land grant school."

Bietau doesn't challenge Capriotti's contention that there are top flight athletes in the state. In fact, he readily acknowledges the fact.

But what the tennis coach does contend is that until those athletes can be attracted to a strong, winning program, they won't come to K-State.

Those factors in mind, and with at least two others weighing strongly in the balance, Bietau made a "painful, well-thought out" choice after two years of attempting to recruit nationally within the United States.

"There are some things specific to the sport of tennis that have led us in this direction," he said. "First of all, we recognized the international basis of the sport. I've read that there are more countries around the world who are participating in tennis than even soccer."

"And then there's the fact that the stereotypical tennis-playing kid is from a higher socioeconomic background. And that's not a kid real excited about turning down an offer from Notre Dame or a coast school to come to K-State."

Those realities, combined with his admittedly failed efforts to get it done in the United States and laborious Home or abroad?

Wildcat coaches John Capriotti and Steve Bietau have been successful with different recruiting philosophies during their tenures at K-State. The following is a list of Capriotti's local harriers and Bietau's foreign netters who have participated in events this fall.

Capriotti's local harriers

Mike Becker, Downs	Jennifer Hillier, Augusta
Jason Goertzen, Salina	Jeanene Rugan, Ellinwood
Ron Smith, Shawnee	Renee Russell, Abilene
Jared Storm, Scott City	Paulette Staats, Wichita
Marcus Wright, Wichita	Janet Treiber, Altamont
Billy Wuggazer, Phillipsburg	Lesley Wells, Garfield

Bietau's foreign netters

Cats make strides during fall

Women golfers break records, win tourney title

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

The fall portion of the K-State women's golf season provided many positives that might help the Wildcats in their bid to climb out of the Big Eight cellar in May.

The Cats had one of their most memorable semesters in school history, defeating 31 of 50 opponents they faced in four tournaments.

K-State won its first event in three years — the Wichita State Shocker Fall Classic. The Cats' 54-hole total of 996 outdistanced second-place Baylor and the rest of the 12-team field.

Perhaps the team's best performance however, resulted in their lowest finish of the year. K-State placed an unimpressive 11th place at the 18-team Diet Coke Roadrunner Classic, hosted by New Mexico State in Las Cruces, N.M.

It was there that K-State set two school records with an all but unimpressive effort. The team shot 968 for the three-day tournament. The final-round score of 316 was the Cats' top single-round score, and the 968 total is a school low for a three-round tournament.

K-State's two other meets, the Cyclone Fall Classic at Iowa State and the Hawkeye Invitational at Iowa, resulted in fourth- and seventh-place finishes from the Cats, both against 12-team fields. The largest pot of gold in each of those meets came in defeating both host schools, Iowa State, a Big Eight opponent, and Iowa, a traditional Midwest power.

Individually, the women's team was led by junior Valerie Hahn. Hahn emerged as the team's No. 1 player last spring and has done nothing to lose that position since.

Hahn, who recorded a stroke average of 81.4, had three top 10 finishes. She was 10th at the first meet, the Cyclone Golf Classic, second at the Shocker Fall Classic and tied for eighth with teammate Adena Hagedorn at the Hawkeye Invitational.

"She's played better than her scores indicate," Coach Mark Elliott said. "Her short game is really her shortcoming, but if she can iron some things out with that, she has a chance to really lower her scores."

Hagedorn, a senior, also responded this fall with competitive play.

"She had an up and down fall," Elliott said of Hagedorn, who posted an 81.9 average. "She played fairly well and had a really good attitude. I was happy with how hard she worked." Hagedorn placed 10th in the Wichita

ON THE WAY UP

The K-State women's golf team defeated 31 of its 50 opponents in tournaments this fall and won the Shocker Fall Classic in September. Here are the individual stroke averages and spring schedule.

State tournament.

But perhaps the most pleasant surprise this fall was the team's other senior, Theresa Coyle. She lowered her stroke average from 86.0 last spring to 82.8 this fall to emerge as a consistent No. 3 player for the Cats. Her best performance was a fifth-place finish at the Shocker Fall Classic.

"She had a big jump," Elliott said. "She broke 80 for the first time and really started to believe that she can play on that higher level."

With seniors occupying two of the top three spots, the improved play would appear to be short-lived. But Elliott put together one of the program's best recruiting classes to help ensure future success.

The team increased from five players to 10 in just one year. Due to the 100-percent increase in depth, Elliott initiated qualifying tournaments before all meets.

The Cats signed four freshmen — Jacque Wright, Donita Gleason, Robin Lewis and Debbie Chrystal — and added a Wichita State transfer in Sarah Ayn Morehead.

Cowboys' season difficult for Jones

Probation puts O-State in danger of year without win

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Never, not even in his wildest dreams, did Pat Jones believe it would be like this.

The Oklahoma State football coach, who in seven previous seasons at the helm had taken four Cowboy teams to bowl games, is suffering through a winless season in Stillwater in 1991.

That's right. Oklahoma State is 0-9-1. A donut-hole, nine and one.

And all of this after a preseason in which Jones talked about the future in glowing terms after the pain of a pair of consecutive 4-7 seasons.

"We will be better," he said, matter-of-factly.

He was wrong, and he admits it freely now.

But the seemingly dead-and-buried Cowboys have shown life lately. A pair of hard-fought losses to nationally-ranked Colorado and Oklahoma have been the last two OSU tilts.

All of this has K-State coach Bill Snyder a bit uneasy entering Saturday's matchup in Stillwater between the two schools seemingly headed in opposite directions.

"I think they will be biting nails all week," Snyder said. "I think they will be wired and ready to the hilt to play."

"When you play teams that have experienced this kind of ill-fortune, it's scary."

Snyder and his Big Eight counterparts have been particularly impressed, of late, with the OSU defense. That defense is coming off an impressive performance against in-state rival Oklahoma.

"I didn't realize (until after the game) that the 308 yards total offense for Oklahoma was the best defensive performance we've had against them since 1982," Jones said Monday at his weekly media luncheon. "I cannot fault us a great deal defensively."

Indeed, OSU has appeared to get things turned around on defense.

The Cowboys allowed 30 points to Arizona State, 40 to Miami, 49 to Nebraska, 41 to Missouri and 31 to Kansas before turning things around against Colorado and Oklahoma.

In fact, the two national powers scored a combined total of 37 points against a seemingly revitalized Cowboy unit.

"I thought going in (to the Oklahoma game) that it would be a very physical contest, and it was," Jones said. "It was what I considered to be a tough-man kind of ballgame."

"That we're able to play like that after not having one says something."

Jones sees the Wildcats as providing his troops a major defensive challenge.

"This will be a different type of test for us defensively, because they have a little bit of every kind of offense," Jones said.

Galactic gas forms on universe's fringe

Astronomers observe light from cloud travelling for more than 12 billion years

By the Associated Press

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Molecules have been detected at the fringe of the observable universe in the largest gas cloud yet seen, a cloud that appears to be a womb for galaxies, astronomers said.

"It's really astonishing," said Robert Brown, an astronomer and associate director of the National Radio Astronomy Observatory in Charlottesville, Va.

"The superlatives here are probably the most gas and the farthest distance at which we've seen molecules," said Brown, who discovered the cloud with follow astronomer Paul A. Vanden Bout, NRAO director.

"This object is 10 times further away than any molecular gas cloud ever seen in the universe," he said.

The cloud, in the constellation Ursa Major in the northern night sky, might have 10,000 times more interstellar gas mass than in the Earth's mature home galaxy, the Milky Way, Brown said.

Light from the cloud has been traveling to the Earth for more than 12 billion years and is seen about 3 billion years after the theoretical birth of the universe in the big bang, he said.

"What we're arguing, given this huge gas content, is a galaxy in formation," Brown said in a telephone interview.

John Black, an astronomy professor at the University of Arizona in Tucson, said that if the estimates are correct, it's a very important clue about how galaxies may have changed over the long periods of time involved in their development.

Galaxies contain hundreds of billions of stars, each formed from the gaseous remains of previous generations of stars.

The formation of the first generation of stars and the formation of galaxies has remained a mystery because the events occurred so early in the history of the universe.

Nick Scoville, an astronomy professor at the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena, said that in a normal galaxy, the amount of interstellar gas is about 10 percent or less of the galaxy's mass and the rest of the gas is bound up in stars.

"Clearly, in the very early stages of a galaxy, most of the material would actually be free gas, not in stars. That is, before the first generation of stars are formed," he said.

In May, researchers using the Infrared Astronomy Satellite found the Ursa Major object, dubbed IRAS 10214+4724.

Brown and Vanden Bout, using the observatory's 12-meter telescope on Kitt Peak, Ariz., discovered carbon monoxide in the object in July, allowing them to determine the age and distance of the cloud.

Carbon monoxide is the most stable molecule in the universe next to molecular hydrogen, Brown said.

However, carbon monoxide did not come from the big bang, which spawned only hydrogen and helium, he said. The elements for carbon monoxide, carbon and oxygen, are formed by the nuclear process, the power inside the sun, he said.

The big-bang theory holds that the expansion of the universe began with a gigantic explosion between 12 and 20 billion years ago.

A generation of stars must have been born in the big cloud and died in massive explosions, ejecting the carbon and oxygen needed for the formation of carbon monoxide in the cloud, he said.

"It was the big bang followed by a generation of stars followed by supernova explosions, then the remnants of those explosions collapsing into a cold molecular cloud," Brown said.

"Maybe it happened more than once." "Cold molecular clouds already formed in the first few billion years of the universe," he said.

Models show galaxies are formed by the gravitational accumulation of pre-existing clouds of gas, Brown said.

"Our observation says that early on, after the big bang, gas clumped rather than smoothly spreading out over the universe," he said.

One of the central questions, Brown said, is how can you start something smooth, expanding away from itself at the speed of light and get it to accumulate to what we know form as galaxies?

Paraguay: haven for dictatorship

Professor lectures about military and political transformation

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Paraguay, like most South American countries, has had a long history of political turmoil.

Marciel Riquelme, associate professor of sociology anthropology and social work, presented a lecture "From Dictatorship to Democracy, Military and Political Transformation in Paraguay," to about 45 students as part of the Latin American Awareness Lecture Series Wednesday evening in Leasure Hall.

Riquelme said in 108 years of independence, Paraguay has only had 28 years of limited political democracy. A military dictatorship of some form has been in place for half that time.

The country now is under a type of military-democracy since the "Colonel's Coup" in February 1989, during which the nation's second highest-ranking general came to power. Previously, a military dictatorship had been in place for 35 years.

Seventy percent of Paraguay's population is less than 30 years old.

"Seventy percent of the population knows nothing but military regimes," said Riquelme. "That is a tremendous limitation for democratization of that country."

Despite many doubts as to whether the new leadership could affect any meaningful reforms, surprising changes have taken place, particularly in the political realm, Riquelme said.

The previous regime was characterized as extremely repressive. It was highly personalistic with the dictator retaining the presidency, leadership of the military and the dominate "Colorado" political party.

Jury selection begins in rape trial

Attorneys differ in style; a potential juror disappears

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — An attorney for William Kennedy Smith focused Wednesday on potential jurors' philosophies on family, politics and honesty during jury selection for Smith's rape trial.

The proceeding was disrupted briefly when one prospective juror slipped away during a break.

Defense attorney Roy Black's questions to potential jurors Wednesday revealed, among other things, that several thought families should help each other in troubled times. One thought that prosecutions can be politically motivated, and another thought a false accusation can be a weapon.

Smith, the 31-year-old nephew of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., is charged with raping a woman at the Kennedy family's Palm Beach estate March 30. He has pleaded innocent.

Black's questions, while posed hypothetically and in general terms, often played on themes related to the rape case. The day before, lead prosecutor Moira Lasch had asked supposedly hypothetical questions that included details of the scenario of the alleged rape.

Selection of a six-member jury, with up to four alternates, was expected to continue through this week. After group questioning, the two sides will begin using challenges to have potential jurors dismissed.

One potential juror, Robert Darr, a salesman for a medical firm, disappeared during Wednesday's mid-morning break, leaving a message with Circuit Judge Mary Lupo's assistant saying he had a personal emergency.

NERFANA

Recreational bliss: hardball pleasure without the pain

Editor's note: With the exception of the Nerf football, the other foam balls appearing with this article are not Nerf products, due to the incredible difficulty in actually finding regular ol' Nerf balls in Manhattan. The photographer tried just about everywhere, and the only way to get a genuine Nerf ball in this town is to buy the Nerfoop set, the cost of which is prohibitive on photographer's pay. He came back mumbling something about a "sad reflection on America."

No physical injury to any animals was incurred during the creation of images for this story, though the photographer was emotionally traumatized as a result of working with a cute, but very uncooperative kitty.

Nerf balls - what a wonderful creation. Nerf lovers have been bouncing these buoyant balls around houses and sailing them across backyards for generations (well, a few years at least). This wonderful concept has helped to develop the very basic social skills of children all across the land.

In fact, tossing a Nerf around is such a national pastime, it should be included in the saying about baseball and apple pie (no one knows what's in those hot dogs, anyway).

These squishy, foam balls are so versatile they can be used for the old standbys of football and catch, or they can be used to whack an irritating sibling over the head. If you poked at him with one of those newfangled toys of today, say a young deformed reptile, its possible he might get ... mutated.

And just about everyone can remember pretending to be a pro athlete and hurling a Nerf ball across the backyard at the annual family reunion. At one of those barbecues it sailed too high and far, creaming Aunt Agatha while she was knitting on the deck. Those social skills really came out when you had to apologize for knocking her glasses clean off her head. But since the Nerf is made of that wonderfully spongy material, she wasn't fazed and sent you merrily on your way.

This creative venture has created a society of fun-loving children who have grown into fun-loving adults just like Aunt Agatha.

Dale Potter, junior in business administration, still enjoys a good, heated game of Nerf ball with his two brothers whenever they go home. It's tough to shake that habit, because when they were younger they played Nerf religiously.

"Nerf ball was the best," he said. "I could bounce it off my little brother's head."

This goes back to the irritating sibling concept. But Potter also bounced his younger brother off a car when they were playing street ball with a standard football.

"After a while, Nerf was the only thing our parents would let us play with," he said.

Every day during the summer and after school, Potter, his brothers and about 10 friends would form teams and play Nerf. Good ol' Mom didn't care as long as they all went home at the end of the day.

But when winter came along with snow, they brought the game inside. They really didn't do TOO much damage - broke a few lights, scared a few cats. "We kind of threw them at the pets," he said. "Cats were a lot of fun to hit with a football."

Eventually the cats got very skittish whenever the Nerf ball was brought out. But that just made the game even more fun. At least until Mom came home. "She didn't think the cat thing was too cool with all our friends over," he said. "They were her cats."

When the cat game wore out, along with their mom's temper, they tried to mess with their dad's dog. A St. Bernard.

"He'd eat the balls - or maul them," Potter said. "And it wasn't much fun trying to get them back from him."

After he munched on them for a while, Potter said the balls didn't quite spiral the same. So the dog game pretty much flopped.

But Potter and his brothers weren't the only ones who imagined up creative games.

Mike Ferguson, Dillon deli clerk, said he and some of his friends played around a lot with a Nerf ball. In fact, just about every kid in the neighborhood joined in, including the neighborhood bully.

"Everybody hated him," Ferguson said. "He was a classic bully and he thought he was a real meanie."

So, they decided to do something about it. They took a regular Nerf ball, cut out the middle and filled it with rocks. Then they used it whenever it was the bully's turn to play catch.

"He caught it and it didn't do any harm," he said. "He didn't even realize what we'd done because he was too stupid. But we felt better."

Because of the soft, foamy material of the Nerf, it isn't designed to hurt anything, even cats and bullies. But besides these games, there are other, more conventional games that can be played with a Nerf.

Like taking the Nerf out to the Lake. A wet Nerf carries a lot more weight than a dry Nerf so whopping a friend over the head with a water-logged ball takes on a whole new meaning. It also tends to spiral funny when its wet, splattering everyone around and smacking the receiver in the face with plenty of water.

Another fun game includes heaving the Nerf ball from one side of the street to a person standing on the other, preferably right when a car passes. Amazingly, this dull-sounding game creates hours of entertainment for children everywhere.

Every day, someone creates a new game to play with Nerf balls. This wonderful, ageless toy is certain to entertain for generations to come.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN SCENE

Play filled with laughter, sorrow

'Any Day Wednesday' explores trials of western Kansas family

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

"Itchy feet," the mother said at the grave of her 21-year-old son. The boy was destined to take chances in life, because, like his mother, he had a case of itchy feet.

REVIEW

Wednesday LeBeau might take a different approach to life than her son, but both battle with a soul that hears the distant whistle of a far-off train and wants to follow.

Those itchy feet of Wednesday LeBeau are at the heart of the play "Any Day Wednesday," an original student production that premiered last weekend.

The play is the work of Stephanie Cox, graduate student in English, and explores the trials and tribulations of a western Kansas farm family thrown into a state of upheaval when the mother, Wednesday, just up and leaves one August morning.

Tired of simply existing day to day in a life that feels like death, and suffocating her a little more each day, Wednesday picks up and leaves her farm in Conrad. She moves to the big town of Hays to serve up french fries and chicken parts at a mall burger joint while she finds herself.

In her absence, the family tries to hold things together with the help of Wednesday's sister, Fuchsia, but they end up falling apart in a whole new way when the eldest son, Tim, is killed in a bungee-cord jumping accident.

The fractured and chaotic family life that sends Wednesday packing is good for quite a few laughs and tears under the direction of Kate Anderson. Overall, the play is a real success.

The acting ranges from good to outstanding, with Amy Strathman as an adequate Wednesday, leaving room for other characters to shine around her. Jerome Seidner is perfectly frustrated as her husband, Hank, but one wonders why it took Wednesday so long to leave if her self-involved, mono-syllabic husband was always so disconnected.

When Wednesday first leaves him, Hank explains to Fuchsia that his wife would have no reason to leave: "I just had the dishwasher fixed for her last week."

Donna Weaver, as Aunt Fuchsia, is a scene-stealer, offering wit and wisdom and large doses of mother-hen meddling.

Also good are Jim Purvis and Jenny Langton as Tim and Sara, who are both as mystified as their father by their mother's leaving.

Cox adds warmth and humor to the script, bringing most of the characters to life with flair. There's always a tendency to ask the playwright for more — spell it all out and fill in the blanks — with a character like Wednesday's, but Cox does the right thing in offering up bits and pieces through both acts.

In the earlier scenes, and even before the final climactic scenes — at the grave and after the funeral — there is a tendency to ask for more insight into the character and her motivation, but Cox holds back with the script, as does Strathman in her performance.

"Any Day Wednesday" will be performed at 8 p.m. Nov. 20-23 in Nichols Auditorium. Student tickets are $5. Call 532-6428 for information and reservations.

Queensryche ready to 'yahoo'

Drinking man's metal band ready to rock 'n' roll tonight in Bramlage Coliseum

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

Eddie Jackson said he took Kentucky last Thursday night.

The next morning, it took him 15 minutes to answer his phone in the Lexington Hyatt Regency.

The Queensryche bass player had the night off that Thursday to sample the Kentucky nightlife before playing Lexington. His next free night was Wednesday in Manhattan.

"We hate the term 'thinking man's metal band,'" Jackson said. "We're more like the drinking man's metal band. Sure, our music is intelligent and politically aware, but that doesn't mean we can't have fun like everyone else."

"It's called 'yahoing.' You've got to pace yourself when you yahoo. We're not into hard-core partying like some bands. It catches up to you sooner or later."

Jackson said the band attended a University of Kentucky basketball game the Russian national team.

"This guy we know — well, actually, a guy we just met — OK, a fan gave us free tickets," he said. "There was this Russian guy with big black Nikes on. It was great; we were calling him 'Air Russkie.' We ended up moshing in the crew bus early this morning. ... Man, do I have a headache."

Trying to conduct an interview with Jackson is like making a first grader sit quietly through church after eating multiple bowls of Sugar Bombs for breakfast. Dodging each question with a joke or story, it was like pulling teeth to get any serious information out of him.

"What's the first thing a blonde does after having sex?" Jackson asked. Being a brunette, I couldn't imagine.

"Opens the car door!" He burst into giddy laughter. "Hold on a second." I heard him gargling in the back-ground.

After over a year on the road, Jackson said he still enjoys touring. Queensryche has been playing venues ranging from 5,000 to 12,000 seats in the United States after a few months in Europe, the summer Rock in Rio II festival in Brazil and a short stint in Japan.

After selling out every show in Europe and Japan, the band is experiencing lukewarm ticket sales in the states. But the group is not discouraged, Jackson said.

"We've had our weak markets, but that's to be expected. I think the recession has also affected a lot of bands this year," he said.

The Building Empires tour is Queensryche's first as a headlining act. The visual stage show includes multimedia communication, Jackson said, with a screen in the background showing various images to accompany each selection.

"It's just like the 'Jet City Woman' video — only in color," he said.

The group is performing its previous album, "Operation: Mindcrime," in its entirety, as well as singles of its new "Empire" CD.

Silent Lucidity, the new album's highest chart climber, has received numerous charges by critics that it is little more than Pink Floyd rip-off. Jackson disagreed.

"It's what Pink Floyd should have been," he said with a laugh. "No, really, these days, whenever you write a song, they (critics) are going to say it sounds like something else, so we don't really mind. It happens to everyone. At least they compared us to somebody we like," he said. "Hold on, I've got to blow my nose. I've got a really bad cold."

With that, he was off again, telling stories of pre-teen intoxication.

"I remember when we were in junior high, and we used raid our parent's medicine cabinets, and everybody would bring bottles of Nyquil over to some guy's house. We'd sit around watching 'Happy Days' or something and try to get drunk. It was really stupid."

Jackson, along with his fellow band members, grew up in Washington state, and all still live in Seattle.

"I don't know why we like it so much," he said. "I guess we like rain. It rains all the time up there. It's gorgeous in the summer, but it pretty much sucks in the winter."

With the recent publicity of so many Seattle bands, Jackson said he doesn't know why the city's scene is so successful.

"I guess it's in the water or something," he said. "There's definitely something there — I mean, you've got Soundgarden, Alice in Chains, Mother Love Bone — which is, of course, no more — and Nirvana. There's just a lot of cool bands from out there."

Warrior Soul, the tour's opening act, fits well with Queensryche's image, Jackson said.

"They're very political and sound like a heavy cult," he said. "Tell everybody you know to come out. It's going to be a great show."

Makin' it great!

Professor praises K-State

Australian teacher impressed with new method of educating elementary teachers

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

K-State's method of integrating knowledge to make better teachers has attracted the attention of more than just education students at the University.

Jane Watson, professor of mathematics education at the University of Tasmania, Australia, is visiting K-State while on sabbatical leave.

Watson, a native Kansan and K-State graduate, spent six weeks in England prior to her visit to the United States. She also plans to spend six weeks in Manhattan. Her purpose is to gain more knowledge about trends in teaching mathematics around the world. Her study, which is funded by the University of Tasmania, allows her to do research, write and meet a diverse group of people.

"Everyone at K-State is very friendly," she said.

Watson is participating in K-State's National Science Foundation program to train elementary teachers in math, science and technology.

"The program at K-State is very interesting because of the connections being made among the subjects, and because there are people other than just the educators helping with the program," she said.

Watson said the work being done at K-State with the NSF grant is some of the best work in the United States because it calls for subject experts, classroom teachers and teacher educators to work together.

Ray Kurtz, professor of elementary education, said the department is always delighted to have scholars from other nations visit—it raises horizons and adds dimensions in teacher training.

Watson gave a presentation to Kurtz's methods class in teaching elementary mathematics.

Debra Hamil, senior in elementary education, said she enjoyed the presentation.

"Jane gives you another way to work with kids to get them excited about learning mathematics," she said.

Kurtz said this kind of motivation is wonderful for the students.

An advantage for K-State students is they have early contact with classrooms and with teachers who serve as mentors for pre-service teachers, Watson said.

When she returns to Tasmania, Watson will be involved in a national program to implement the studies of math and science in their classes.

She received a bachelor's in mathematics and physics from Sterling College, a master's in mathematics from the University of Oklahoma and her doctorate in mathematics education from K-State.

Students volunteer at local hospital

Residence hall supports community service program

JULIE LONG
Collegian Reporter

Some new faces can be seen at Memorial Hospital on Wednesday afternoons. Five students from Moore Hall volunteer at the hospital as a part of a residence hall project.

"I thought it would be a good community service project for the hall," said Annette Batchelder, sophomore in math and Moore Hall resident.

Batchelder approached the hall executives to get a reaction. She then called Memorial Hospital to see if they would work with the hall.

Nancy Haines, director of volunteer services at Memorial Hospital, said she was enthusiastic about the idea.

The students started working at the hospital in early October. Two students work at the hospital each week and alternate working on the weekends.

"We went for orientation the first week in October, and we've been taking turns ever since," said Hope Hurla, sophomore in secondary education.

The students have a variety of duties. They work in the gift shop, visit patients, deliver flowers and mail, file medical records and do some clerical work. They also help admit and dismiss patients after hours.

Batchelder said it gives the Aircraft company sold to investors

Analysts praise, politicians worry about U.S. production

By the Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Wall Street analysts are praising McDonnell Douglas Co.'s decision to sell a big chunk of its commercial aircraft business to a Taiwan-led investor group, but politicians in Washington are worried.

"I'm not suggesting that McDonnell Douglas isn't doing what it needs to do, but I just think this raises real concerns about the future of the U.S. in aircraft manufacturing," Sen. Jay Bingaman, D-N.M., said in a telephone interview from Washington.

Bingaman said on Wednesday that he plans to hold a hearing to find out more about the deal and look into other options for the company.

McDonnell Douglas announced late Tuesday that it had reached an agreement with Taiwan Aerospace Corp. to sell 40 percent of its commercial aircraft division for up to $2 billion.

The St. Louis-based aerospace giant has been battling financial troubles and the growth of the European consortium Airbus Industrie in an effort to regain its spot as the world's second biggest commercial jet maker.

To many, the issue is the difficulty American companies face competing against heavily subsidized, cash-rich foreign companies in the international marketplace.

Figures compiled by the Aerospace Industries Association, a trade group in Washington, show Boeing Co. has 50 percent of the world's commercial aircraft market, Airbus has 21 percent and McDonnell Douglas 20 percent.

In 1987, Boeing had 64 percent, McDonnell Douglas had 23 percent and Airbus had 8 percent.

Analysts and industry experts agree that McDonnell Douglas had to find a partner or face the prospect of slowly losing even more of the market and eventually exiting the business.

Moreover, they say that the rules in the aerospace industry have changed and joint ventures with wealthy foreign companies are going to become commonplace.

"The idea is that if this is going to happen, shouldn't we be involved to have some control over it rather than having it happen around us with no say in what's going on?" said David Vadas, an economist with the Aerospace Industries Association.

The nation's two biggest jet-engine makers, General Electric Co. and Pratt & Whitney, both have joint ventures with European firms. McDonnell Douglas already assembles airliners in China under a licensing agreement with that country. Boeing has subcontracting partners in Japan and Italy.

"The manufacturing situation in the world over the past 20 years has changed so that now you have to look everywhere for what you need," Boeing spokesman Craig Martin said. He said up to 25 percent of some Boeing jets are made with overseas parts.

McDonnell Douglas officials say they looked everywhere and came up with Taiwan as the best choice. Stock analysts say the Taiwan deal will give the company a big infusion of cash to help reduce the company's nearly $5 billion in debt, access to the commercial aircraft market in Asia and access to low-cost labor.

The company is, however, planning to build its new MD-12, which will compete with the Boeing 747, in the United States. Nine cities around the country are vying for that plant.

Brothers seek hellos today

By the Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Two brothers who believe peace begins with a pleasant greeting are urging world leaders, celebrities and ordinary people to say hello Thursday to 10 people to celebrate World Hello Day.

"It's something people can do on their own in widely different places," said organizer Michael McCormack, a 39-year-old free-lance writer who lives in the Omaha suburb of Bellevue.

"It gives people a chance to do something about the world; it empowers them," he said.

This is the 19th year for World Hello Day, intended to "celebrate the importance of personal communication to preserving peace," McCormack said.

While a student at Harvard University, McCormack began World Hello Day in response to Middle Eastern tensions.

McCormack and his brother Brian, a political science graduate student at Arizona State University, send thousands of letters each year to world leaders, celebrities, newspapers and magazines, noting the World Hello Day date and explaining the simple celebration.

To observe it, someone merely has to say hello to any 10 people. It doesn't matter whether they're friends or strangers.

Over the years, the brothers have received responses from thousands of people in 144 countries, including 110 world leaders and 21 Nobel Peace Prize winners.

The Dalai Lama, the high priest of Tibetan Buddhism who won the 1989 Nobel Peace Prize, wrote this year that he appreciates the idea behind World Hello Day, "especially its encouragement to use peaceful means to resolve disputes."

Anglican Bishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, the 1984 Nobel laureate, called World Hello Day a "splendid idea."

G-7 nations seek tons of Soviet gold as collateral

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Group of Seven industrial nations want almost half the Soviet Union's gold reserves as collateral for a multibillion-dollar debt relief package, a spokesman for the republic of Byelorussia said Wednesday.

Officials also said the wealthiest democracies threatened sanctions against republics that refuse to sign an agreement accepting responsibility for the Soviet Union's debt, which some officials have put at more than $100 billion.

A day after announcing it would defer Soviet debt payments, the Group of Seven lay down the terms, pressing the 12 Soviet republics to adhere to their international commitments.

Viktor Danilenko, the Byelorussian government representative in Moscow, said the Group of Seven had proposed deferring $3.6 billion in debt payments due over the next year. An Italian official, speaking anonymously Tuesday, indicated the deferred amount would be more than $6 billion.

The G-7 members — the United States, Japan, Germany, France, Britain, Italy and Canada — also offered the disintegrating superpower a $1 billion loan for short-term debt obligations, Danilenko told reporters.

The package would free up cash for the Soviet effort to move to a market system from the wrecked economy left by the former Communist regime. In exchange, the Group of Seven wants 104 metric tons of gold as collateral, Danilenko said. That is worth about $1 billion at Wednesday's prices.

The Soviet Union has only 240 metric tons of gold, according to Grigory Yavlinsky, the top Soviet economic adviser. He has discounted Soviet State Bank reports the country has 374.5 metric tons of gold.

Danilenko spoke outside a closed-door meeting between Group of Seven financial experts and officials from the eight republics that agreed Tuesday to accept responsibility for the total foreign debt.

Four republics — the Ukraine, Azerbaijan, Uzbekistan and Georgia — refused to make an immediate commitment to repaying a share of the debt. In response, the G-7 threatened them with "very serious economic sanctions," Yavlinsky said.

Uzbekistan's Vice President Shukurullo Mirsaidov said the threat was voiced by the United States and Britain. It was also delivered to Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev when he met the G-7 delegation Wednesday, the Interfax news agency said.

Despite its vast mineral and industrial resources, the Soviet Union has struggled to make loan payments because of the collapse of the centrally planned economy and the transition from strong Kremlin rule to a looser federation of republics.

Gorbachev on Wednesday asked the Soviet parliament to approve an emergency budget calling for a big deficit to keep the central government afloat until Jan. 1.

Gorbachev backed his request with gloomy economic projections and warnings of catastrophe. He said Soviet industrial production had fallen 7 percent this year and that agricultural output was down 9 percent.

But Boris Yeltsin's Russian Federation refused to go along with Gorbachev's budget, saying the deficit would lead to a hemorrhage of rubles and delay the creation of a hard currency.

Without Russia's cooperation, the budget stands little chance of success, and Gorbachev's government could find itself without cash.

Yeltsin, however, said his powerful republic might be willing to assume the burden of repaying the debt taken on by the Soviet republics through Nov. 15, Radio Russia reported.

That was the day that Russia, the largest and richest republic, cut off funds to most central government ministries and took control of most of the Kremlin's money supply and cashing exports, such as gold, oil and diamonds.

Uzbekistan's Mirsaidov said a representative of the Soviet foreign trade bank told the G-7 officials the foreign debt now tops $100 billion. The previous government estimate was $81 billion.

Mirsaidov said his Central Asian republic was willing to repay its share of the Soviet debt but refused to accept responsibility for other republics.

"We shouldn't pay for the sins of others," he said.

If the G-7 withholds aid and investment, his Muslim republic will turn elsewhere, such as to the oil-rich Middle East, Mirsaidov said.

The Ukraine said it would not sign the debt pact until it received a detailed bill and an accounting of Soviet assets. Those figures were expected to be available within 10 days.

Georgia's representative said he needed to consult with the republic's government. Azerbaijan's reasons for refusing could not be learned.

That group has battled with returning players Denise Pottle and Julie White for tournament action. Of the 10 players on the team, eight different players qualified for tournaments. If nothing else, the fall season gave the Cats a good chance to acclimate the newcomers to Big Eight golf.

Wright and Pottle played in eight rounds this fall, with Wright averaging 87.5 and Pottle 88.5 strokes per round.

"Denise didn't play that well this fall," Elliott said. "But she's someone that we need."

Elliott said he was pleased with Lewis and Gleason whose lone tournament was the Wichita State tournament.

"The longer they're out there, the more difficult it is to figure out what real condition the body was in," he said.

Finnegan said if there are no apparent fatal wounds, toxicology tests may be administered to see whether there are any foreign substances, such as drugs or poisons, in the person's system.

"Toxicology scans can take a number of days before they have anything," he said.

Finnegan said many of the toxicology tests are not useful after a body has been outside for an extended period of time.

Finnegan also said it is a possibility with any unexplained death the authorities may know the cause of death but do not want it to be public knowledge.

research, brought Bietau to this point.

"If you take a look around at collegiate tennis, there's a proliferation of foreign players," he said. "Oklahoma State is a fine example. They've dominated the conference, and the vast majority — if not all — of their players have been international."

"But be assured, we didn't want to go that way just because everyone else was doing it."

In fact, Bietau stressed that his main recruiting emphasis lies now where it always has been.

"We will always recruit in Kansas first," he said. "The players, though, have to be at the level we're playing at for us to recruit them."

Bietau's recruiting of foreign players of that caliber comes mainly by word of mouth — from the foreign players currently on the roster and over the phone lines.

"In some ways, it costs less to do it this way," he said. "You cut out campus visits, which can run $300 to $500, and there's no flying out to see the players play."

That lack of face-to-face exposure — which Capriotti obviously gets by recruiting in state — is one thing that bothers Bietau, however.

"It's part of it that I really don't like," he said. "There are definitely some inherent risks in doing it this way."

And make no mistake about it, Bietau doesn't want to do it this way forever.

"I wonder sometimes if we wouldn't be better off going in another direction," he said. "I'm not 100 percent for continuing in this direction forever. It's the route I've chosen for a couple of years here."

The coaches agree that what they're looking for is really quite similar.

"We want someone who can come here and be a part of the K-State family," Capriotti said. "This is a very unique place, and those who come here recognize that."

they are on probation their sophomore or junior year and saying, 'I had a learning disability in high school, but I didn't want to tell anybody about it,'" Holden said.

This is changing, however.

"Students are realizing they need to come out of the closet and be very up front about this and deal with it," she said.

Improvements in counseling and academic assistance in elementary and secondary schools are having an effect on encouraging more learning disabled students to go on to college.

"Because of that, they have a better understanding of their potential and what they can do," Dyck said.

When someone seems bright and capable of doing well in school but isn't, there could be several reasons. There could be educational deficits, such as not finishing high school and getting a GED instead. Emotional stress can also cause problems.

"When you begin to rule out other things, and the student is saying, 'I don't get it. I studied 15 hours for this test. I thought I knew the material, but I still flunked,' and the student seems articulate and intelligent, you might begin to suspect a learning disability," Holden said.

Affiliation with the party was required to get many jobs, including teaching. It was also needed to get prescriptions from public hospitals or to get credit from the central bank. All military officers were required to be party members. This form is similar to those implemented in Soviet Russia and communist China.

In many instances in South America, military regimes act as a transitional phase in the restoration of civilian rule. The lack of a plan of succession that was viable and acceptable to the military was one of the key factors leading to the 1989 coup.

Riquelme said when he interviewed many senior military officers six months before the coup, they expressed concern over three main areas. Primary concerns were low salaries for military officers and rampant corruption within the government. They were also concerned about the military being used to put down peaceful civilian demonstrations and the interference of the government into affairs that were traditionally considered military domain.

"It is for good reason that coups have acquired a bad reputation amongst Latin American intellectuals," Riquelme said.

McClaskey third female student body leader in University history

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian Reporter

When Jackie McClaskey was sworn in as student body president Thursday night, she became only the third woman to fill that office at K-State.

Student Council, the forerunner to Student Senate, was founded June 12, 1909. The first female president didn't come along until nearly 40 years later.

Ethelinda Parrish was the first woman elected president of Student Council in 1944. She was chosen during a special election for president when several student council members were drafted to fight in World War II.

She was selected by the Council rather than a campus-wide election.

According to the "History of Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science," Parrish served when the college abolished K-State's no-smoking policy.

Parrish, who is now Ethelinda Amos of Estes Park, Colo., said she had no difficulties serving as president.

"It was a different position for women back then, even on the collegiate level," Amos said.

"Something was different. The men were gone because of the war. It was really different."

Amos said during her term the Council addressed many important campus issues. President Milton Eisenhower was in favor of lifting the ban on smoking, she said, so guests visiting the University could smoke.

Almost another 40 years passed before K-State had its next woman president.

In 1981, Angela Scanlan won the campus-wide election. Scanlan said she was pressured during her campaign.

"I was told on a daily basis that a woman would never win," she said.

Competition was stiff during her campaign, she said.

People sometimes made innuendoes about her gender that were trivial in nature, but she said she never took them seriously.

An editorial cartoon, which she described as sexist, was printed in the

Jackie McClaskey

Collegian. Scanlan said the cartoon caused a stir on campus and incited several people to write letters to the editor.

Stereotyping is something women still have to fight to get respect, she said.

For the first two weeks of her campaign, Scanlan used only her last name to gain recognition. She said her campaign was very strategic.

"I felt like I had all the players around the University in place," Scanlan said.

"I tried to go beyond and around the female issue. I had lots of support, especially many male supporters who made a difference," she said.

McClaskey said gender wasn't an issue at the beginning of her campaign, but it eventually became one.

She said people told her and her campaign staff they were basing their decisions to vote or not vote for her on her gender.

McClaskey said she encountered gender-related comments more than she anticipated. When she spoke to some people, she said, she could tell it was a factor.

"The stereotype of women is out there," McClaskey said. "Some individuals whom I spoke to wouldn't pay attention to what I had to say. It was obvious to me that it was because of my gender."

McClaskey said making decisions will be a problem.

"I've already got the feeling that some of my decisions will be looked at more critically," she said.

She said she believes many of her

The 1991 Student Senate calmly called its last question and passed its last bill to conclude a tumultuous year Thursday night. Now, the power is in the collective hands of the 1992 Senate.

In a meeting that ran more than six hours, newly elected senators were sworn in along with new Student Body President Jackie McClaskey, and elections began for Senate officers.

Swearing in the new people did not take much time. However, nominating, debating and electing the new Senate chairperson did.

Six people vied for the position: Neil Neaderhiser, Roy Cessna, Derek Nelson, Jeff Peterson, Tricia Thornton and Heather Riley.

After lengthy discussion, Heather Riley, senior in English, was elected to the position.

Many senators said although electing the new chairwoman was an arduous process, it was time well-spent because it is an important position.

"The first thing they do is decide which committee legislation goes through, including skipping committees altogether," said Joel Gruenke, former graduate senator.

He also said the chairperson decides where legislation is placed on the agenda and who is called on for speaking privileges.

Although some debate could have been construed as negative, most senators agreed all of the candidates were qualified.

"We will get a good chair because we have a good slate, but we want the best," Arts and Sciences Senator Craig Raborn said.

Former Senate Chairman Pete Marsh said the office requires a large time commitment. He said some of the responsibilities of the office include running the Thursday meetings; running Senate Executive Committee, which sets the meeting agenda; sitting on the UFM Board of Directors; sitting on Faculty Senate and Recreational Services Council; and deciding who will be the chairpersons of

Condoms available soon

Condoms will soon be available in vending machines in some campus buildings.

The service will be made available through the K-State Union Vending Services which is already in charge of maintaining and servicing the machines.

"Condoms will only be placed in locations where they are requested," said Bill Wisdom, manager of Union Vending Services.

The service is available to all buildings on campus with vending machines already in place.

Offering vending machines strictly for dispensing condoms is not feasible due to cost.

Until now, condoms have been available at the Lafene Health Center pharmacy and the Women's Clinic in Lafene.

Condoms have also been available for sale at the front desk of Marlatt Hall and the Quik Cats convenience store.

Cindy Burke, student health staff assistant at Lafene and a member of the Communicable Disease Committee, said the recommendation was made by the committee as a result of a poll taken last year during Condom Sense Week.

A majority of the students who were polled said they thought condoms should be offered on campus and did not believe it would jeopardize the University's reputation.

Burke said this service needs to be offered due to the high number of college students who are sexually active and the dangers presented by sexually transmitted diseases which condoms can help prevent.

"We're not trying to promote sexual activity," Burke said. "We just want to keep our students safe and healthy."

The Association of Residence Halls approved the placement of the condoms, but is leaving the final decision up to each individual hall.

The West Hall Housing Governing Board approved placing condoms in the hall's vending machines at its meeting Monday night.

"This is just another service we can provide to our residents," said Todd Rasmussen, director of West Hall.

"It's an item residents may or may not purchase," Rasmussen said. "It's their decision."

Haymaker Hall approved providing the condoms as a result of an opinion poll given to residents.

Out of 585 residents, 305 voted, with an 82-percent majority supporting the sale of condoms in the hall.

Both Goodnow and Ford Hall will have opinion polls following Thanksgiving break to decide on the issue.

Two buildings on campus have actually requested the service from the Union Vending Services so far, Wisdom said.

Policy hurts foreign students

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Two new immigration rules may decrease foreign students' chances of finding off-campus employment and cause confusion in their student visa paperwork.

Under section 221(a) of the Immigration Act of 1990, students studying at universities on student visas must comply with changes in the rules.

Although foreign students are still eligible for part-time off-campus employment, they can be hired only after an employer has recruited for 60 days to fill the position.

If a U.S. citizen does not fill the job during the 60-day recruitment period, the foreign student may be hired.

For foreign students in Manhattan, finding off-campus employment after the 60-day waiting period could be impossible.

"The time to fill job openings in Manhattan varies. On the average, it takes two weeks," said Lorene Oppy, manager of Job Service of Manhattan.

"Sometimes, if we have a job opening in the morning, it might be filled by the afternoon. Thirty days is the longest it usually takes to fill a job," she said.

Kansas allowed to use $75 million

Approval enables state to meet financial obligations

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state dipped into its idle funds on Thursday and borrowed $75 million to meet the government's December payroll and other financial obligations.

State Treasurer Sally Thompson signed a certificate of indebtedness, which allows the state to put money in its general fund from other funds. Most tax revenues flow into the general fund, and it finances important government operations.

Thompson took the action just hours after the State Finance Council approved Gov. Joan Finney's plan to have the certificate issued. The council comprises eight legislative leaders and Finney, who serves as its chairwoman. It acts for the Legislature when it is not in session.

The state is in the same position as an individual who borrows money from a savings account, puts it into a checking account to pay household bills and rebuilds the savings account balance with money from a future paycheck. The state must replace the idle funds it borrowed by the end of the current fiscal year, June 30, 1992.

The council's meeting was relatively brief, and no members spoke against issuing the certificate.

State Budget Director Gloria Timmer said the council had little choice.

"If we don't get the certificate, we will be unable to make the major payments that are due at the end of the month and then the payroll in December," she said. "Those are statutorily required payments."

Timmer said the cash flow problems arose in part because tax revenues do not flow in even increments into the general fund. Thus, the state is required to make large payments before large revenue collections.

"This is a matter of cash flow," said House Speaker Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg. "It doesn't mean we're broke. It means we'll have the money in a few weeks or a few months."

Five certificates were issued during troubled fiscal times from 1982 through 1986, when John Carlin was governor, and their amounts ranged from $30 million to $140 million. The largest was issued in November 1986.

Former Gov. Mike Hayden made a campaign issue out of Carlin seeking the certificates. He immediately cut the state budget by $60 million when he took office in January 1987 to avoid using the management tool.

"There are 1,200 funds in the state treasury, and this is the one fund," Finney said, referring to the general fund.

Finney needed the votes of six of the eight legislators on the council to have the certificate issued. All seven lawmakers present voted for the proposal.

Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, was in Japan on a trade mission. However, Finney said he was available to vote by telephone for the plan if necessary.

Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, previously expressed concern about issuing the certificate. However, he acknowledged there was little else the council could do.

"I, for one, will not be a party to running the state broke," he said.

Number of suicide attempts high

Depression, life setbacks lead to thoughts of death

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Suicide is one of the leading causes of death among college-aged people.

University Counseling Service at Lafene Health Center dealt with 60 individuals with suicidal thoughts during the 1990-91 school year, said Fred Newton, director of the counseling service.

This probably represents a small portion of the actual number of students who consider suicide as an option, he said.

"It's not uncommon for us to deal with suicide ideation," he said.

Thoughts of suicide can be triggered by many things including severe depression; critical setbacks in work, school or social life; low self-esteem or the loss of a relationship, Newton said.

"A lot of times, an abusive background can lead to suicidal thoughts," he said.

Andrea Chirafisi, senior in psychology and assistant coordinator of the Fone Crisis Center, said most of those who call the center with suicidal thoughts are suffering from a combination of problems that have just piled up.

"A lot of them call in and say, 'I can't deal with things anymore,'" she said.

The Fone Crisis Center receives a few suicidal calls a month, Chirafisi said.

Depression, a frequent warning sign for suicide, can result in the person withdrawing from others, sleeping a lot, looking at the world negatively and feeling that things are hopeless.

Sometimes depression will be expressed by the person verbally, Newton said.

For example, a person might say, "Things will never get better. There's no hope."

Debate team sixth in early rankings

The Kansas State Debate Team is currently ranked sixth in the nation after the first set of rankings were released Monday.

The team, which will travel to Wichita this weekend to compete in its final tournament of the semester, was ranked No. 1 in their region.

Coach Susan Stanfield said she was satisfied with her team's place in the rankings, which was higher than last year's national championship team debuted at in the rankings.

"Were in the top 10 out of 300 schools, but obviously we would like to do better," Stanfield said. "The first set of rankings doesn't mean much anyway."

The team earned its high rankings by finishing with three first-place finishes by a two-person team in different tournaments. It also earned two first-place finishes in the sweepstakes division at separate tournaments.

As for closing out the semester in Wichita, Stanfield said the tournament will be one of the more difficult ones of the season.

"It will be smaller than usual, and it will have all tough teams, no easy ones, so it will be harder," she said.

WordPerfect presents educational forum

An Educational Awareness Forum on WordPerfect software, including presentations on products faculty members had expressed interest in seeing, will be today in Cardwell 42.

This is WordPerfect Corporation's first visit to K-State. Three morning sessions and four afternoon sessions, which will cover the same material for those who couldn't attend in the morning, will focus on several different types of software.

The day is sponsored by Computing and Network Services and the College of Education.

Faye Kennedy with Computing and Networking services said, "The intent of the program is to bring different products to campus, so a larger number of people can see them if they are interested in purchasing some."

Frenchman rows his boat across Pacific

ILWACO, Wash. (AP) — The treacherous waters at the mouth of the Columbia River today were all that lay between a French adventurer and his goal of crossing the Pacific Ocean in a rowboat.

Gerard d'Aboville, 42, was expected to come ashore this morning at Ilwaco, at the southwestern tip of Washington state, after a harrowing, four-month journey of 6,300 miles in a 26-foot boat of molded carbon fiber.

Family, friends and dozens of French journalists were expected to greet the Frenchman, who on Wednesday night was 26 miles from the mouth of the river in waters known for dangerous currents and tricky winds.

D'Aboville spoke by radio Wednesday with his wife and parents. He sounded "exuberant," said Christophe Hebert, a member of his support team. "He said he was really happy to arrive. It was very hard for him the last few days."

The Frenchman's personal physician, Dr. Jean Yves Chauve, said he was in good health.

D'Aboville set out from Choshi, Japan, on July 11 in a bid to become the second person to row alone across the Pacific. He had set a course for San Francisco but headed farther north to escape a troublesome current and shorten the journey.

Reuters retracts school massacre story

NEW YORK — Reuters news agency on Thursday retracted a series of stories from Yugoslavia on a report of a massacre of 41 schoolchildren.

Reuters said the source of the story had retracted his claim to have seen and counted the bodies.

The Wednesday report was from a free-lance photographer, Goran Mikic, who told Reuters and Belgrade television he counted the bodies of 41 children in a schoolyard in the village of Borovo Jaslje, near Vukovar. He quoted Yugoslav soldiers as saying the children had been massacred by Croatian national guardsmen who cut the children's throats before they fled the village.

The Croatian government protested the report and questioned Mikic's credibility, Reuters said. The news agency said Mikic was questioned further and retracted his claims.

Reuters issued an advisory to editors withdrawing the story.

Belgrade television and other Serbian-controlled news media also carried Mikic's claim.

Nazi victims' pensions remain intact

BONN, Germany (AP) — The German government said Thursday it has abandoned plans to cut monthly pensions nearly in half in former East Germany for victims of the Nazi regime.

After unification of the two Germanys in October 1990, the government planned to cut monthly pensions to $470. But following talks between Heinz Galinski, head of the Jewish Community in Germany, and Labor Ministry officials, the ministry agreed to keep pensions at $875 a month.

About 10,000 people in former East Germany receive the pensions. They include Jews, other victims of the Nazi regime and anti-fascist fighters.

Tammi Meyer, senior in animal sciences and industry, practices goat tying (ABOVE), her best event. She competed in the national rodeo finals in Bozeman, Mont., in 1990, where she won two scholarships for her academics though she did not win any events. Meyer warms up her roping mare, Sinnif's Patty Star (RIGHT), before practicing her goat tying at her husband's homestead 14 miles northeast of Manhattan. Meyer ropes on the horse twice a week and practices on dummies the other days to keep stress on the horse down to minimum.

Competitions get Meyer's goat

K-Stater leads academically, strives to inspire rodeo teammates

By the Collegian Staff

Tammi Meyer maintains a 4.0 grade point average while competing in goat tying, roping and barrel racing throughout the year with the K-State rodeo team.

Meyer, senior in animal science, said her biggest reward came last year when she won the central plains regional women's goat-tying competition and was awarded a saddle and plaque by the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association.

The award was based on year-long competition between the Kansas, Oklahoma and Northwest Missouri regions, which include 20-30 colleges.

Last year, Meyer made it to the national finals in the goat-tying competition in Bozeman, Mont. She didn't place in the nationals, but she did win two Copenhagen scholarships while there.

The scholarships are awarded to the two top females and males academically in the rodeo competition. Meyer was the top female with a 4.0 GPA.

Meyer has been on the K-State rodeo team since her freshman year, in 1988. This year, she is the women's team captain.

"I want to bring the girls together more as a collective effort for the team," Meyer said. "We have a lot of talent. We just need to work harder as a team."

Meyer said goat tying is clearly her best event, but she said she really enjoys roping.

"She is really good at goat tying," said Merle Flinn, rodeo team adviser. "Her time is usually between 7 and 8 seconds."

Flinn said Meyer has gotten several other girls interested in goat tying.

Meyer practices every day on her own and with the team on Tuesdays and Thursdays. When she is not practicing on a horse, she practices roping a dummy.

She also works with her horse to keep him in shape because he has been injured quite a few times this past year.

To enter a single event at the college level, Meyer will spend about $100. This money goes into a jackpot for the winner.

"I have won around $700 in a single rodeo before," she said.

Her goal this year is to make it back to Bozeman in the college finals as well as keep up her grades.

Meyer said motivation is the key word in her performance.

"I thank God for my talents," she said.

"I don't go out there just to win. As long as I know I did my personal best performance, then that is the best reason for performing. This is extremely important to me."

Meyer got married last December to Kerry Meyer, junior in animal science. Both of them are from Iowa, and they met while rodeoing in high school.

"He is a big help," Meyer said.

"He's my sideman."

Kerry Meyer said, "Tammi is motivational. She tries to get the team going."

Tammi Meyer said her family is supportive.

"My dad has only missed one of my rodeos so far," she said. "He's a big supporter."

When she started out at 8 years old, she belonged to a nationwide organization called Little Britches. She qualified for the finals, but never went.

Meyer also showed horses in 4-H for about 10 years.

"I really got into rodeos by my freshman year in high school," Meyer said. "That is when I got into it big."

She participated in rodeos at the high school and amateur level while living in Ottumwa, Iowa, and was a member of the national high school rodeo team in Iowa for three years.

Meyer was rodeo queen of the Iowa Rodeo Association in 1988 and went to the high school national finals three times as well as the state finals several times.

She would definitely like to rodeo professionally someday.

"If I find the right horse, I will go," she said. "Of course, I would have to barrel race, and that is my least favorite event."

Meyer is a member of Mortar Board, Golden Key, Alpha Zeta and is president of the agriculture ambassadors.

Top 10

Collegian's top 10 reasons
K-Staters should be thankful

As K-State students, we should be thankful for a lot of things that make University life here special. In the tradition of David Letterman and late-night television, we have composed a top-10 list of things K-Staters should be most thankful. To get the full "Letterman" effect, cover up the list and reveal the lines one at a time.

Feel free to clip it out and take it home to your family holiday gathering.

Reasons for K-Staters to be thankful:

10. Ever-growing canceled classes list makes figuring out your schedule a breeze.
9. We beat KU.
8. Banana signs in the Union point out that, though refrigerated, their bananas are still fresh. (Oh, and those blow-up cows over the dairy cases are a nice touch as well.)
7. Lack of parking encourages "racewalking" to classes and a sharklike feeding frenzy for spots in the Union parking lot.
6. During rainstorms, some academic buildings have their own built-in showers. (No need to go back to the dorm.)
5. Gov. Joan Finney's thinking of K-State as second-rate university relieves the "pressure" on us.
4. University president doubles as custodian and groundskeeper.
3. Collegian still has the comics and a crossword puzzle.
2. Overcrowding forced Farrell Library to do away with some of those annoying books.

And the No. 1 reason for K-Staters to be thankful (drumroll, please):

1. Football team's schedule allows them to be home for the holidays.

Just walk

Best option to parking problems seems to be two feet

Although the student body presidential elections are over, one issue that many candidates addressed is still smoldering under the surface — what to do with the parking problem.

Some candidates had what might be viable solutions to this problem.

But instead of trying to come up with an elaborate plan that might end up costing the University, and inevitably the students, big bucks, we should take a look at the real problem.

People just don't want to walk. This campus really is not that spread out. There is no reasonable argument for implementing an intra-campus shuttle system to replace the current one, which provides transportation for handicapped students.

And quite a few students live in the dorms or within five or six blocks of campus. Often, it is out of just plain laziness that people drive to campus.

The City of Manhattan has chosen not to implement a public transportation system which would provide service throughout the city and to residents as well as students, and K-State doesn't have the resources to implement one on its own.

So, students, if you live in an apartment complex out of "walking distance" — grab a ride on those groovy buses a few of them provide.

Otherwise, if you're physically capable, leave for class a little earlier and walk or bike to campus. You'll not only get some exercise but also save yourself the stress of fighting for campus parking places. And you'll spare our city a little pollution.

Maybe parking permit purchases could be limited to only those students who live farther than five blocks from the edge of campus. This would probably open up an amazing number of spaces for the people who really need them.

Of course, many people will probably complain this isn't fair to those who live close to campus, because they should be able to drive wherever they want.

Get real. Walking a half a mile or mile hasn't been proven to hurt anyone, yet. And just think of all the stories you'll be able to tell your grandchildren about how tough you had it when you were a kid.

JARED GREGOIRE

Christmas wishes include action figures, toy guns

I had a rather interesting conversation the other day.

While musing over a variety of toys to get ideas for my column last week, I confronted a 12-year-old boy who was in the throes of speculating which various action figures his mother might be getting him for Christmas.

He lay in the middle of the aisle as though he were watching television, holding the unopened packages in his hands and providing the sound effects they would make once released from their plastic prisons.

I came down on my haunches next to him, only to be eagle-eyed, as though I might snatch away the toys that in essence were already his.

"Can I ask you a few questions?" I began, hoping he wouldn't go off screaming that some really weird guy was trying to steal his stuff. I had no real desire to explain my curiosity to the store security.

"Yeah, I guess. Whatcha want?" he responded, which was good. At least I'd found someone who figured he could run faster than I could if he had to make a quick getaway.

"The guys in the packages you're playing with, are they your heroes?" He pondered the question for a moment, then warily let out his answer. "Yeah, I guess. They're pretty cool."

I could tell the boy, whose name I later found out was Timmy, had already guessed that I wasn't out to pilfer his goods.

"Why are they your heroes?" This question evoked a look of total dismay from Timmy, who must have thought I was from another planet for not knowing the answer.

He hesitated, then responded, "I guess because they got the best guns and stuff. This one here can fly and drop bombs from his chest, and this one can spin in a circle and shoot flames everywhere. I had this one guy, but he got lost. I think my dog got it." (It always fascinates me how kids answer questions that haven't even been asked.)

"So, you like these because they cause the most destruction and stuff?" I asked, trying to keep the conversation at a productive level. "These guys really kick some butt?"

OK, maybe I shouldn't have said that to a 12-year-old, but I really wanted an honest answer. Besides, a quick look-see made sure his mother wasn't around to hear it.

"Yeah, they sure do. My brother Mike's got some others, and I always beat him. He don't play with me much no more, but my other friends do." And then Timmy went back to playing, as though he'd sufficiently answered my questions, and I had vanished into thin air.

I stood up and walked in front of the display of figures for sale. Some could swim underwater, some could shoot lasers, and still others were invincible to bullets, fire or pain. I thought of how many times I wished I had the abilities of some of these toys.

Then I wondered why it's necessary for us to have to create toys with weapons supposedly strong enough to protect our children's imaginations when we should be doing it ourselves.

I questioned the wisdom of a society that offers its children guns, flamethrowers and missiles to solve problems instead of understanding, acceptance and interaction.

Timmy's voice pulled me away from my thoughts.

"Which guy is your favorite?" I hadn't heard him come up next to me.

I looked over the selection, settled on one figure that I suppose was the medical stud of the group and pointed at it. "Him, I guess."

That incredulous look came over Timmy's face again. "Why that one? He ain't got no guns or anything, just some dumb medicines and stuff." From his perspective, the kid had a point.

"Well, because he just goes around fixing people when they get hurt, which I doubt is often, looking at these guys," I responded.

"That's pretty dumb," was Timmy's response.

"Yeah, you're probably right," I said as I walked off, hoping the next aisle had a kid laying in the middle of the floor playing with a die-cast metal tractor.

'Let us be first burn victims'

Editor,
We are writing in response to Lee Hildebrecht's letter of Nov. 20. Lee, we first would like to thank you for a most enjoyable lunch while reading your letter. It "tickled" us beyond our belief in intelligent life.

First of all, we have no qualms about these "four naked people" who were pictured in the Collegian. They were not truly nude, for they covered themselves. By the way, how did God create you — with clothes on? We think not.

As for the ACLU, it serves a great purpose in that it fights for the rights of Americans. We also believe that the homosexuals of this world, whom you are attacking with unjust prejudice, were also created by God.

In response to your opinions about Magic Johnson: You may not find him worthy, but he is still a great idol to many children. Even though he contracted the HIV virus, he is using it to educate these children, so they won't make a mistake of their own. (By the way, we don't know if what happened to Magic was a mistake on his part.) The supporters of condom use, such as Magic, are simply being realistic in this harsh age, unlike some people who still insist on living in the Dark Ages.

In closing, we feel that if God is going to send fire down from the heavens because we believe in the ACLU, condom use, homosexuality and Magic Johnson, let us be the first burn victims to be admitted to your hospital.

coverage amateur

Editor,
We would like to express our disappointment in the amateurish way in which the Student Government elections were covered by the Collegian. Rather than express the facts and inform the students, the Collegian staff chose to wallow in liberalistic ideas and present nothing but its own opinions.

We are tired of reading the same old self-righteous liberal columns. We failed to vote in the final elections for SGA president because the Collegian left us wondering if there were any real issues or if this was a joke they were playing on everyone. Well, the joke is on the Collegian. They have shown once again that this paper does not deserve the funding it is given. We just don't believe the joke is funny at all.

Details need to be pointed out

Editor,
Your informative article regarding the recent address given by Peggy Jarman at Monday's Voices for Choice meeting should be commended. The reporter's impartiality on this very controversial issue was much appreciated. However, I would like to comment on two points.

1. The description of Tay-Sachs disease was incomplete. It failed to communicate that this is not a birth defect. Rather, it is an excruciatingly painful, degenerative and always fatal disease.

2. In an otherwise unbiased article the use of the term "pro-life" was misleading. This implies that the pro-choice movement is "anti-life." Please consider using the terms "pro-" or "anti-" abortion rights.

Thank you.

Religion teaches some to fear, hate

Editor,
I am writing this letter because I am afraid of what Lee Hildebrecht and people like him want to do to my beloved country.

We sit here, thousands of us, reading the Collegian with our eyes glazed over and an overwhelming non-concern for the rights of those cast as subversive or "evil." Life on the college campus impedes our sense of belonging to a larger community and promotes the fascist tactics of members of the self-proclaimed "moral majority," who are neither.

People who share the basic moral philosophy of Hildebrecht have the rest of us in a vise grip. We are tied down, gagged and blinded by their sweeping generalizations and perpetuated delusions.

They try to brainwash the masses into believing that they speak for the working man, the oppressed or the poor. They chant slogans and incessantly remind us all the "evil" that permeates our society at every level.

It seems to me that the people who control the flow of information to the masses must dream up a new "evil" every so often, just to remind us of our depravity. A couple of weeks ago on this campus, that "evil" was heavy metal music on KSDB-FM 91.9.

Today, it is the mere thought of sex. The saddest part of this whole story is that many recognize the lies, but few are brave enough to confront them.

Your religion teaches you to hate and fear everyone but yourself. You take the negative side of humanity and use irrational fears to suppress and coerce the rest of us to your own will.

In your letter, you stop at nothing to chastise minorities, non-Christian religions, education and even the threat of skin cancer. There is no love in your heart. My God teaches me how to find the best in people to help them through the journey of life. My God would never tell me to hate someone, and I don't. I don't even hate you for hating me.

Availability of condoms affects use

Editor,
Lately, we've seen several articles in the Collegian referring to the outbreak of STDs on campus. We, as students, are told to protect ourselves by using condoms regularly. But there is one problem regarding this solution — students are too embarrassed to purchase condoms from a store, Lafene Health Center, etc. If condoms could be bought discreetly, more students would be willing to use protection.

My suggestion for this discreet purchase is to have condoms available in candy machines across campus.

Students could purchase a condom without the embarrassment of asking for them. And this, in turn, would reduce the transmission of STDs.

As students, you need to voice your concern to increase the health of this campus by discussing this very important topic with your student senator. Thank you for your concern.

K-State needs
optional-meal deal

Editor,
It is time for the K-State Food Service to implement an optional meal system for students living in residence halls. This plan should replace the established 20 meals per week, "like it or not" system. K-State and one other university are the only schools in the Big Eight with this senseless and unfair meal system. Currently, K-State residence hall residents are losing money for every meal they miss. It's time to give them a choice. Let them choose how much to eat.

Communications degree not option

Editor,
Point of clarification in reference to the article, "Advertising pupils plentiful" in the Nov. 20 Collegian: The sub-title states "Communication option one of the hottest and fastest growing at K-State," and that is inaccurate.

While there are specific areas of communication study in various departments, such as advertising in journalism and mass communications or rhetoric communication in the speech department, students at K-State cannot get a communications degree at this time.

We would encourage students who want to pursue a communications option to take coursework in both speech and journalism and mass communications. Hopefully, someday, an interdisciplinary major can be developed that will allow K-State students to earn a degree in communications.

Success to follow success

An end marks a beginning, or so the old line goes.

That's the case Saturday, as the K-State football team closes its 1991 season on the same day that the Wildcat basketball team lifts the lid on its 1991-92 campaign.

And success will give way to success in Manhattan.

Coach Bill Snyder's unit has a chance to cap off a seven-win year in Stillwater, Okla., against Oklahoma State. If the Cats do so, they'll become the first K-State team to win seven on the gridiron since 1954.

Coach Dana Altman's hoop squad opens against Texas-San Antonio, a team that was 21-8 a year ago. Altman's crew may be the most athletic ever to set up shop in Manhattan, and they'll begin demonstrating that athleticism Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Who knows how Saturday's pair of contests will come out. It's entirely possible Oklahoma State will capture its first football win of the year, and that Texas-San Antonio might leave Bramlage with a season-opening win.

Both scenarios are highly unlikely, but even if they came to pass, they wouldn't obscure what has happened, or will happen, with the two Wildcat teams.

Snyder has taken the football program to new heights seemingly every week this season.

Whether it was grabbing that elusive, streak-breaking road win, or taking Nebraska and Colorado to the wire, this unit has provided the kind of excitement on the football field that has been absent since 1982.

That year, for those living in a vacuum, was the lone year K-State made a postseason bowl trip. And that K-State team finished its regular season with a record of 6-4-1. Snyder's unit can top that in Stillwater.

But, even more importantly than wins and losses, Snyder has brought something to K-State, and its athletes, that had been sorely missing in these parts for far too long: pride.

K-State football players now have pride in themselves, their teammates, their coaches and the program. In Snyder's first season, the pride was something that Snyder transfused, like blood.

Now, however, the pride is something that flows freely from each player, coach or fan involved with the program.

K-State football is no longer a running national joke. In fact, Sports Illustrated magazine even ate a rather large plate of crow — with several courses yet to be served — in this week's edition. The magazine buried the Wildcat program in 1989, only to have to pronounce it reborn this week.

Never, ever, underestimate Snyder or those around him. Belief in oneself and those around one does wonders. That's a common thread between the two programs to be showcased Saturday.

Altman's basketball squad appears to be building that same kind of belief — and with good reason, it would appear.

With the influx of community college talent that was a K-State trademark in the mid- to late 1980s, the Cats appeared poised to make a return trip to the NCAA Tournament.

Yes, this was a team that finished last in the Big Eight last year. But no, this team won't finish anywhere near there this year.

Altman was the recruiting genius that enabled K-State to make its gains in the mid- and late '80s, and he's got another by his side in Kerwin, who helped Oklahoma become the only team standing between K-State and a Big Eight title in one of those campaigns.

The combo is unbeatable.

And, though one season will regrettably end one game short of where K-State fans might have liked, there is a light at the end of the tunnel. The long-time basketball school that became a football school for one year is now about to become known for both sports.

It's about time.

Cats center John Rettiger is starting his fifth and final season with the team in the season opener in Bramlage Coliseum Saturday night against Texas-San Antonio. The Roadrunners were 21-8 last season.

Ready or not, Cats to take court for season opener

Roadrunners expected to yield tough early test

By the Collegian Staff

An inexperienced K-State basketball team will put its preparation to the test Saturday.

For Coach Dana Altman, preparing the team for its opener with Texas-San Antonio has been a race against time. With 11 players on the roster who did not see action with the Wildcats last season and new limits placed on practice time, Altman has been rushed into bringing the team to a competitive level.

Two exhibition games and a hurried practice schedule have not rendered an accurate preview of what to expect, Altman said of the team. Progress has been slow, causing the coaches some concern for the team's preparation.

"You never really know how that many new players are going to respond," Altman said. "I'd like to think they're ready to play a ballgame, but we've got a long way to go."

The biggest obstacle for the team has been working eight newcomers into the routine while helping three returners get back in the flow after sitting out last season.

Sophomores Askia Jones and Deryl Cunningham will be counted on to produce, despite having sat out the past season. Four junior college transfers will also play a key role Saturday, forcing them to make the adjustment to Division I basketball in a hurry.

"We've got some players that need to get out on the floor, and the thing that will help them is game experience," Altman said. "I'd like to think the team will progress in every ballgame. We're not nearly ready at

Milestones loom for Cats in final game

Winless Cowboys stand in way of K-State's most victories since 1954

DAVID SVOBODA

The finish line is in sight, though no one wants to end the race just yet.

That's the case for the Wildcat football team, which ends its most successful campaign since the Independence Bowl year of 1982 with a 1:30 p.m. contest Saturday in Stillwater, Okla., against winless Oklahoma State.

"It'll be good to be done, but it's really snuck up on me," said fifth-year senior offensive lineman Doug Warren, who started last week in a 32-0 win over Missouri. "I know I'll miss the atmosphere around here."

Should the Cats win Saturday, they'll cap off the first seven-win year for the program since 1954. Coach Bill Snyder was a teenager of just 13 then.

But beyond all of the records that may fall Saturday — or have fallen already — there's the lure of ending the season on a high note that drives the Cats, Snyder said.

"Above and beyond all, there's the opportunity to win the last ball game," Snyder said of his team's chance to get a year-ending win for the first time since a 1984 trouncing of Colorado. "That's nine months of a little security and a better feeling about yourself."

But how motivated can this team be?

The Cats have already achieved the big goal on the horizon — gaining a sixth win and assuring themselves of a season above the .500 mark. And they're about to enter a game against a team that is 0-9-1 and has scored just 80 points all year long.

"We'll take the same approach we've always taken," Snyder said. "We'll be honest with our young guys (about OSU's struggles)."

"There are a variety of different records and first-time happenings that come with every victory here. That's important to our program."

And, make no mistake, Snyder and his team aren't taking the Cowboys lightly.

"These (OSU players) are young guys with a great deal of pride, like our guys have," he said. "And you can bet your boots they'll be ready to play."

Snyder is particularly wary of the Cowboy offense, which has shown a commitment to running the football in seasons gone by — Thurman Thomas and Barry Sanders are examples — but seems to be showing a Hart Lee Dykes-type wrinkle in 1991.

And Dykes has the only name above K-State's Michael Smith on most Big Eight career receiving record charts.

"If you look in the statistics, the thing that frightens you a bit ... is that they have the second- and third-leading receivers in the conference (Bert Milliner and Robert Kirksey)," Snyder said. "And this has been a team not known for running the football."

Milliner has caught 44 passes for 548 yards, and Kirksey has caught 34 balls for 475 yards. Only Smith, at 54 and 762, bests those marks.

Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones, like Snyder for the Cowboys, has a healthy respect for the team that will roam the opposite sideline Saturday.

"I think they're playing with quite a bit of confidence," Jones said. "It's the best K-State team that we've seen since their 1982 squad that went to the Independence Bowl."

Jones pointed to K-State strengths on both sides of the ball as being things that have caught his eye in film study.

"They are very balanced offensively. They run draws, options and have a good throwing game on top of that," he said. "We'll have to play well across the field. "And on defense, they stunt around quite a bit. Our coaches think this is the best K-State defensive unit that we've seen in years."

That unit and the offensive unit combine to include 18 seniors who will be viewing or playing in their final game as Cats.

Spikers to play Buffs in finale

The K-State volleyball team will conclude its season against Colorado Saturday at the Coors Events Center in Boulder, Colo.

The Wildcats will enter into the game with a Big Eight Conference record of 1-10, which places them in a last-place tie with Missouri.

While K-State has lost its last four games, the Buffs are in the middle of a four-game winning streak. Colorado, ranked 20th in the latest NCAA poll, has a conference record of 9-2. The Buffs' only two league losses came against national power Nebraska.

For Colorado, the game against K-State won't be much more than a practice game for the Big Eight Tournament Nov. 29-30 at the Civic Auditorium in Omaha, Neb. The Buffs will play third-seeded KU in their first match.

Colorado, which defeated the Cats in three games a month ago in Manhattan, will take a huge statistical advantage into the match. Colorado leads the league in both kills and digs, while K-State is at the other end of each list.

The Buffs have three players who are among the top players in hitting percentage. Wendy Van Wyhe leads Colorado's strong offensive line with 321 kills in 664 attempts.

Table tennis tourney slated

The K-State Table Tennis Club will play host to its fourth United States Table Tennis Association One-Star Tournament Saturday at City Auditorium.

Tournament coordinator David Surowski said the event is aimed at "the occasional player." Competitors may play in non-sanctioned junior and novice divisions or the USTTA sanctioned brackets.

"We can find a level for everyone," Surowski said. "Our goal is to get as many occasional players to come out. A lot of those play in our events and end up wanting to join the USTTA."

Registration for the tournament begins at 8 a.m. Play in the various divisions begins at 9 a.m.

Harriers finish preparation for NCAA Championships

DAVID SVOBODA

In a span of just over two hours Monday morning, it will all be over for the K-State women's cross country team and Wildcat men's competitor Todd Trask.

That's the approximate amount of time it will take to contest the men's and women's races at the NCAA Championships in Tucson, Ariz., and to tally the results that will determine team placings and All-American status.

For the women's team and Trask, running at nationals culminates a season filled with struggles and hard work, Coach John Capriotti said.

"This is what you train for all year," Capriotti said. "And you need to make sure you've got nothing left when you're through."

Capriotti said K-State's women face a difficult challenge Monday, but not an insurmountable one.

After a somewhat disappointing finish at the Big Eight meet, and a 40-point loss to Nebraska at the Region V meet, Capriotti insisted the women would have to be much better at nationals to avoid finishing last among the 22 teams competing.

He hasn't changed his tune.

"We need to run a lot better to be successful," he said. "We just need to put together a total team race. We haven't done that this year."

With the exception of Janet Haskin, who was lost to the team because of an injury early in the year and has redshirted, the women are healthy entering the meet.

That, coupled with strong recent performances by Janet Treiber and Paulette Staats, leaves Capriotti optimistic heading into the competition at the El Conquistador Country Club, located just minutes from the campus of the University of Arizona.

"I expect Treiber and Staats to do well," he said. "And they have to. Our up-front girls have to do a good job. We've got to have someone in the top 40 to 50 scoring places."

"It's a pretty relentless race. There's not a lot of fat there."

Capriotti said a team race could lead to a finish in the top 15 teams for the women, and said Trask is capable of putting together an All-American individual performance.

To be an All-American, a competitor must finish among the top 25

Professor one of first U.S. volunteers

Benson works as accountant, secretary, tutor, during stay in Kenya

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

In 1964, the United States Peace Corps sent its first volunteers into Kenya, Africa. Janet Benson, associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, was one of the 30.

"We were the first group to go into Kenya," Benson said.

She had a bachelor's degree in English and a few classes in anthropology when she applied to the Peace Corps. Calling anthropology "the discipline that made sense of the world," Benson had already decided to study it as a graduate student when she applied to the Peace Corps.

Her training for the job in the 1960s included role-playing, race relation lectures and 320 hours of intensive Kiswahili language training.

Although the language training proved useful, Benson said, some of the other training wasn't that practical.

"The slides showing the crops in Kenya didn't arrive until the last week of training," Benson said. "We said later that we should have learned less about communism and more about cows.

"The attitude at the time was that a B.A. generalist had a broad background and could learn to do anything."

"We were supposed to go out and give advice to people about growing corn and raising cattle," she said. "But there were people who were agriculture extension specialists in that country already."

"Our attitude was that we wanted to do something positive, but we thought it was somewhat presumptuous to send people off to foreign countries for two years and fix everything."

Benson learned her first practical lessons about development in the Peace Corps.

"It really takes about two years just to understand the situation," she said. "You must wait, reserve judgment, listen and observe."

"I learned humility very quickly."

"Unless you understand the reasons for human behavior, you don't know how to change the behavior," Benson said.

She said she realized there were a lot of things you can't do for people — they have to do it themselves.

"It is easy to go in and build a road or a bridge, but to convince people it is their bridge so they maintain it is very difficult to do."

"What you find again and again is that the people who are there are already doing things the best way they can, given the circumstances," she said.

Benson worked as a secretary for an extension officer, tutored women in English, straightened out account books and worked with a women's milk cooperative during her stay in Kenya.

During the monsoon season, she helped transport a young woman in labor by four-wheel-drive truck to a health clinic and assisted a midwife in delivering the healthy baby.

"The midwife couldn't speak a word of English, but she did the paperwork for the birth in perfect English — she had memorized the proper terms," Benson said.

The woman's husband refused to help with the delivery because it was what he thought of as "women's work." Benson encountered a division between men and women not only among the Kenyans but also within the Peace Corps.

The projects for women volunteers during her service were unstructured, she said.

"Men were assigned to be cooperative officers while women were left to make up their own projects," she said.

Benson said she persevered, created and found a lot of different things to do, but the lack of structure in the program made it difficult.

The highest drop-out rate for Peace Corps workers was for those without a structured position, she said.

"If they have a clear position, people can cope. But if they are thrown out there with nothing to do, that's a very bad situation. It's psychologically difficult," she said.

Benson finished her service in 1966 and went to graduate school to study anthropology.

She visited with her colleagues last summer in Washington, D.C., at their 25th Peace Corps reunion.

Most of the volunteers she served with attended the reunion, and Benson said most of them were involved in activist roles.

"One thing about the Peace Corps is that it is bringing home people to the United States who have had firsthand experience of other countries," she said.

"It makes us a more educated nation. I gained an understanding of what life is like in another society."

Volunteer gives, takes

Bresnan enjoyed working overseas for Peace Corps

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Damian Bresnan spent his entire life in the same house on the same street in Champaign, Ill.

In 1983, with a degree in horticulture, Bresnan was recruited at the University of Illinois to be a United States Peace Corps volunteer in the Republic of the Philippines.

"I wanted to go away and see other places," Bresnan said.

Bresnan, now a K-State forestry research assistant, got his chance and, in the process, experienced a lifestyle quite different from the only one he'd ever known.

From Illinois, he went to the province of Nueva Viscaya on the island of Luzon in the Philippines.

"It was the hardest thing I've ever done, or will ever do, in my life," Bresnan said.

For two years, he lived in a bamboo house on the side of a mountain without water or electricity.

He learned to speak Ilocano, one of the most common of the 80 dialects spoken in the Philippines.

Bresnan was trained as an agroforestry extensionist and worked with the Philippine Bureau of Forestry Development during his two-year service.

"When I went, I didn't know anything about tropical plants," he said.

His main project was a land stewardship program with tenant farmers. The goal was to get farmers to plant trees on the hillside where they were farming cash crops.

If they agreed to help with reforestation, in 25 years they would legally own the two hectares of land allotted to them.

Bresnan said the first six months were the hardest.

"At first, you wonder what you are doing there, and the people don't understand why you are there," Bresnan said.

The language barrier sometimes caused confusion.

Bresnan told one farmer he did greenhouse work back home. The farmer, finding this common ground, took Bresnan on a four-kilometer walk to see his green house.

"Once you click with them and get over the language barrier, it's much easier. You do whatever you can while you're there," Bresnan said.

He grew mushrooms, cared for a tree nursery near his house and built stoves during his days in the Philippines.

"Most of the people cooked on three rocks. The stoves made firewood use more efficient," Bresnan said.

Since his time in the Peace Corps, Bresnan said he has a different perspective on life.

After working with people who earned $1,200 a year or less, he said some of his habits have changed.

"It's the little things that have changed," he said.

Bresnan said he eats less pizza and junk food than he did before his Peace Corps experience.

"Dinner to me now is vegetables and rice," he said.

Walking to work most of the time instead of driving is another big change.

Band to get new turf

Soil conditioner, plowing combat compaction problem

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Marching Band practice field will receive a tuneup.

The field is going to go through turf grass renovation starting this fall or spring.

Jerald Lane, director of facility custodial services, said the facility maintenance has not yet decided if they are going to plow the field this fall or wait until spring.

Soil compaction is the major concern with the practice field and plowing helps break up the soil compaction.

After the field is plowed, facility maintenance will prepare a seed bed. Mixed in with the soil is turfus, which is a soil conditioner that minimizes soil compaction. Triatholon, a blend of tall fescue grasses, is the type of grass being planted.

Lane said they will begin to plant the seed in mid-April and proceed by watering the area all summer.

There will be a temporary post and chain around the practice field through summer, until the grass gets established.

Stanley Finck, assistant professor of music and band director, said he hopes this will keep students from walking across the field.

Lane said a sidewalk or shrubs are not in the plans at this moment.

Long accused of misconduct

KBI discovers partiality on part of county sheriff

By the Associated Press

ATCHISON—Following a nine-month investigation, Doniphan County Sheriff Mark Long was charged with misconduct while he was sheriff in neighboring Atchison County.

The charge, accusing the sheriff of partiality by not serving a summons on himself and his wife, was filed Tuesday by Gunnar Sundby, Atchison County attorney.

Sundby said Long was arrested Wednesday in Doniphan County by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, which had been working on the case. He was released on a $1,000 personal appearance bond.

Long made his first court appearance Thursday on the misdemeanor count of official misconduct. His attorney, Jerry Kuckelman Jr., filed a request for a jury trial. An arraignment was scheduled for Monday before Atchison County District Judge Maurice O'Keefe.

The sheriff declined comment on the charge.

Sundby had requested a KBI investigation to determine what happened to $3,542 in cash that disappeared during Long's administration in Atchison County. Sundby and Dennis Parker, the present sheriff, had conducted a preliminary investigation.

Sundby said the KBI was unable to determine who took the missing cash because it had been kept in an unsecured temporary location where a number of people had access.

"During the course of the investigation, the KBI discovered partiality on the part of the sheriff in failing to serve himself and his wife a summons to appear in court when being sued in Doniphan County," Sundby said.

He also said the investigation showed the pattern of partiality continued once Long had become the Doniphan County sheriff.

Sundby had asked the attorney general's office to handle prosecution of Long. However, that office turned him down because of time and budget constraints and referred the case back to Sundby.

Long was Doniphan County undersheriff before being appointed sheriff in Atchison County in 1987 after the resignation of Dennis Weinmann. He later was elected to the office but resigned in October 1990 so he could accept a governor's appointment as the Doniphan County sheriff.

Bush signs civil rights bill

Congressional tensions remain over discrimination issues; law negates court rulings

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON—President Bush signed a civil rights bill Thursday that he said would "fight the evil of discrimination."

He also tried to silence a new furor over race by withdrawing a tentative order to end government hiring preferences for blacks and women.

"For the past few years, the issue of civil rights legislation has divided America," Bush said. "No more."

But the political divisions that sustained a two-year congressional fight over the civil rights bill and prompted Bush to veto a similar measure last year remained sharp.

The new law negates Supreme Court decisions that made it more difficult for minorities to win lawsuits charging job discrimination by employers. It also expands the rights of women and religious minorities to sue and collect damages for job discrimination, including sexual harassment.

It was Bush's agreement to support a modified version of the bill and drop his potent political argument that it would prompt employers to resort to racial quotas that brought overwhelming congressional passage.

However, Bush signed the Civil Rights Act of 1991 in a Rose Garden ceremony that was overshadowed by the controversy over a proposed presidential affirmative-action order circulated Wednesday evening to government agencies. Most Democrats stayed away from the signing in protest.

The order would have ended preferential hiring and promotions for women and minorities and dropped federal guidelines for hiring practices that the courts apply to private businesses — rules that had their start in the Nixon administration and have been in place for two decades.

White House spokesmen said Bush had never seen the document. They said it was written by his legal counsel, C. Boyden Gray, and circulated without Bush's approval.

Gray accepted total blame for creating the flap.

"I regret it. If it's the only mistake I make, I won't be doing too bad," he told the Associated Press.

He said he did not realize how the statement would be interpreted and that it was never intended to target affirmative action or the setting aside of federal contracts for minorities and women.

"That's a mistake I should have anticipated," he said.

"I didn't think it was that big a deal," he added.

White House officials said Bush was unhappy about the incident.

"He was clearly distressed that what should have been a fairly clear signing ceremony had been clouded," one senior official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

After the signing, the White House released a new statement in Bush's name replacing the earlier one and deleting the termination orders for affirmative action programs.

But presidential press secretary Marlin Fitzwater refused to rule out the possibility that Bush would later order such changes.

"We support preferences and set-asides as long as they're consistent with the law," Fitzwater said.

Separately, a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there is strong support among Bush's advisers for proceeding with the dismantling of some affirmative action programs.

That official predicted more activity in that area and said Bush decided to remove the language proposed by Gray because "he thought this was not the right time."

"I support affirmative action," Bush said in signing the new civil rights law. "Nothing in this bill overturns the government's affirmative-action program."

"Unlike last year's bill — a bill I was forced to veto — this bill will not encourage quotas or racial preferences because this bill will not encourage lawsuits on the basis of numbers alone," Bush said.

He called the measure "a law that will fight the evil of discrimination while also building bridges of harmony between Americans of all races, sexes, creeds and backgrounds."

Bush was joined at the bill-signing ceremony by congressional Republicans, administration officials and one Democratic sponsor, Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Other Democrats stayed away in a protest of the withdrawn order.

"Mr. Bush, you ought to be ashamed," said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., who was repeatedly beaten and arrested during the civil rights struggles of the 1960s.

The controversy arose at a time when Bush is under increasing political pressure from Democrats on domestic issues and from the right wing of his own party. A pair of potential Republican challengers, Patrick Buchanan and former Ku Klux Klansman David Duke, have directed criticism at Bush for agreeing to the rights bill.

Civil rights leaders expressed outrage at the original order on affirmative-action programs and said they feared Bush was only postponing a direct attack on two decades of civil rights laws and policies.

"What was distributed last night reflects what the right wing truly believes, and my guess is they'll continue their campaign to weaken the 1991 Civil Rights Act and the bipartisan enforcement policies that have been in place for two or three decades," said Ralph Nease, head of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

The chief Republican sponsor of the bill, Sen. John Danforth of Missouri, said the earlier presidential order was regressive and would have been a very serious mistake.

Hospital boycott on hold

HCA Wesley officials deny activists' request

By the Associated Press

WICHITA — A proposed abortion-related boycott of HCA Wesley Medical Center was put on hold Thursday when area pro-life ministers refused to support it.

The Rev. Gene Carlson of Westlink Christian Church, a leader in Wichita Area Pro-Life Pastors, said his group needs more facts before deciding which action to take.

At issue are four resident physicians at HCA Wesley who also work at Wichita abortion clinics. Anti-abortion activists have threatened to boycott HCA Wesley unless it forbids the physicians from working at the clinics. Hospital officials said Thursday they have no legal or ethical right to do so.

On Wednesday, Bryan Brown, director of the Wichita Rescue Movement, a pro-life group, said he believed Wesley would refuse requests to restrict the residents' activities. He said bumper stickers and other materials already had been printed, and there were "scores, if not hundreds, of people wanting to picket Wesley."

But at Thursday's news conference, Brown said the Wichita Rescue Movement had put itself under the leadership of the pastor's group on the issue. He refused to answer any questions.

Carlson was asked what happened during his organization's meeting Thursday to cause it to back away from a boycott.

"I don't know that I feel obligated to share that with you," Carlson replied.

Wesley officials said earlier Thursday they were prepared to increase their security police staff or do whatever else was necessary to maintain access to the hospital and continue providing medical care.

Hospital President Jim Biltz said state and federal laws guarantee access to the hospital.

The hospital board's executive committee voted unanimously Thursday to resist the boycott, said Nestor Weigand Jr., HCA Wesley board chairman.

"Medical decisions should not be dictated by the political desires of any one group," a statement adopted by the board said.

Senate committees.

In addition to a new senate chairwoman, other positions were filled Thursday evening.

Senate unanimously approved the appointment of Scott Truhlar, junior in pre-medicine, to be chairman of finance committee, which recommends allocations for campus organizations.

"I'm very pleased to have been chosen for this position. It's going to be an exciting, fast-paced term, and I hope I can help students by leading a responsible and efficient committee," he said.

Senate also elected Becky Heble, senior in accounting, as Senate vice chairwoman.

Former Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt offered some advice to the new Senate regarding what he termed communication problems within past student governments.

"Please be careful in your choice of words to the paper and on the Senate floor," he said. "I believe you can do things behind closed doors and behind the paper. If you can resolve an issue responsibly and ethically, there is no need for political, public acrobatics."

Former Human Ecology Senator Jeff Forkenbrock said he was ambivalent about the end of the 1991 Senate.

"I'm sad to be finished, but glad because I will have so much more time," he said. "I had meetings every Monday, Tuesday and Thursday night."

appointments will be looked at closely and that people have insinuated she might lead her cabinet with women.

"I don't view my decisions as being decisions being made by a woman," McClaskey said. "I decide them as Jackie McClaskey."

"I put my heart and soul into my campaign, and I will be putting that into my presidency."

McClaskey said her gender also has positive aspects.

"The fact that I've been elected student body president could have a positive effect to those women who feel their gender stops them from reaching their goals," McClaskey said. "It also shows that the campus doesn't discriminate. And it shows the diversity of the campus."

She said though it wasn't an issue during her campaign, knowing people may look at her in a certain light will affect her term.

"I didn't think it was significant in my campaign," McClaskey said. "I never said, 'I'm a female.'"

"That shouldn't be what decides it."

this point, but a realistic timetable is that we continue to improve throughout the month of December and early January. Five or six weeks of practice before our opener doesn't give you much time to blend in 10 new players."

With such a premium placed on practice, Altman said effort and concentration were critical.

"We've taken some steps, but I have not always been pleased with the effort we're giving," Altman said. "There are some players who've made outstanding improvement, but as a whole, our concentration and intensity have prohibited us from making some of the strides we've needed."

Another concern of the preseason has been the health of key performers including Jones and junior college transfer Gaylon Nickerson. Altman said the pair, in addition to others who have been slowed of late, will be ready for Saturday's contest.

Texas-San Antonio brings a senior-dominated lineup back from last season, in which the Roadrunners won the Trans-America Athletic Conference with a 21-8 mark.

The fast-breaking Texas squad returns two 20-point scorers in guard Ronnie Ellison and forward Keith Horne. Shawn Jamison, San Diego State's leading scorer and rebounder from the 1989-90 season, has transferred into the Roadrunner program.

If family ties play a role in the contest, the Roadrunners will look to Tajau and Afis Olajuwon.

"I know they've got a big brother who's pretty good," Altman said of the brothers of Houston Rocket all-star Hakeem Olajuwon. "They're athletic. They're not quite as big as their brother, but they are athletic and they play hard. They're definitely a couple of solid basketball players."

Altman has emphasized defense and rebounding, structuring the lineup accordingly. He stressed that the defensive performance of the team is critical.

"We need to be consistent with our defensive effort," Altman said. "We've got some players who are pretty quick and should be good defensive players. On rebounding, we're not a big team and are going to have to use our quickness to the ball and make sure we're checking people out."

Offensively, Altman said he anticipates the team to rise above the shooting problems that plagued it last season. The team shot just 35.7 percent in the exhibition opener, but improved to 51 percent Friday against Michigan AAU.

"We need some of our players to do a better job of deciding what is and what isn't a good shot," Altman said. "And now that we have a few more people that can shoot the basketball, we really need to look to define some roles."

Suicide

are drastic behavior changes, a neglect of appearance and isolation.

Newton said there is a particular danger for international students to feel isolation because they are so far from home.

A K-State international student committed suicide last year.

A person who expresses a thought-out plan for how to commit suicide is more at risk than other individuals.

A previous attempt also makes a person more likely to have suicidal thoughts.

The first thing a person can do to help someone considering suicide is listen, Chirafisi said.

It is important to listen and not dismiss what the person is saying.

"Saying 'Everything will be OK' doesn't help," Chirafisi said. "What we do best is listen."

Fone volunteers try to offer an objective opinion to callers as well as alternatives that the caller hasn't thought about yet, she said.

"If we can get them to wait two hours or 24 hours, we've done some good," she said. "Then we have a chance to get them referred."

Newton said it is also important to be direct with suicidal people.

"Ask up front 'Are you thinking about suicide?'" he said.

This lets the listener know exactly what is on the person's mind.

Then the listener is faced with the dilemma of confidentiality.

Newton said confidentiality should be kept until the person becomes potentially dangerous to himself or to others.

If the person does show a desire to harm himself, then significant others in the person's life should be contacted or the person should be referred to a professional, he said.

Chirafisi said there seems to be a stigma about seeking professional help.

"It's seen as a sign of weakness to seek help," she said. "I think it's a sign of strength to seek an objective approach."

Some sources of help include the Fone Crisis Center, other crisis hot lines, the University Counseling Service, Pawnee Mental Health Services and self-help groups on campus.

To help people get over depression, encourage them to do something, Newton said.

Walking, making lifestyle changes, relaxing and eating right are some positives that can help people pull themselves out of depression.

"Find enjoyment in something," he said. "Watch funny movies."

Chirafisi said the holidays and finals create a setting that can result in an increase in depressed, possibly suicidal callers.

wants the audience to feel for Miller and Peck as the underdogs, but in this case, the emotion level runs low.

Another problem with "Money" is the character development. DeVito is the only character in the movie who shows another side of himself. Miller begins to display a gentler personality that is never fully produced.

Peck, on the other hand, portrays the most underdeveloped of all characters. His character displays the identical personality at the beginning and ending of the film.

"Other People's Money" is truly a disappointment.

Viewers will be bored by the underdeveloped script and characters but surprised by the acting. DeVito, Miller and Peck should all be given credit for their talent. It's quite obvious that these actors have the ability and talent to make even the most problematic script work.

Robert Kidd, alien certification coordinator for the Department of Human Resources in Topeka said, "I would say in most situations there are more than enough American workers to fill college jobs."

"If an employer fills a position with a foreign student, they must send a document to the school and to the Department of Labor stating they recruited for the position for 60 days and no American applicants qualified for the job," Kidd said.

A second change is in the paperwork on the student visa form.

For the 1,100 foreign students at K-State and the International Student Center, the changes are creating a large amount of confusion.

Upon admission, foreign students at K-State are issued an I-20 certificate of eligibility form. This form is the legal immigration document stating that the student is eligible to apply for a student visa to study in the United States.

In the past when a foreign student came to the United States on a student visa, the student had an unwritten grace period of six to 18 months to complete their studies, depending on the normal length of the program they were enrolled in.

Now, all students will have a one year grace period, however, that one year grace period must be written in to the I-20 form.

This means that some K-State students need to change the date on their I-20 form in the International Student Center in order to stay in status with Immigration.

"We have paper work prepared under the old rules, because the rules have changed. It's going to get confusing," said Donna Davis, director of International Student Center.

"Students think they have that unwritten grace period, but under new regulation, if the paperwork doesn't include the grace period, they don't really have it," she said.

For some students the change will not matter because they will finish their studies early or on schedule, but for others, a change in the grace period regulation could cause problems.

Israel angered by choice for conference site

Negotiations will continue despite dispute, Shamir says

By the Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel's Cabinet Sunday blasted the United States Sunday for ignoring Israeli wishes and setting Washington as the site of the next round of peace talks.

But Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said he did not expect the peace process to be derailed by the dispute.

Israel has still not said whether it will accept the U.S. invitation to attend talks starting Dec. 4 in Washington, although the Bush administration said it wanted responses by Monday. The Jewish state has lobbied hard to hold the next round of talks in the Middle East.

Police Minister Roni Milo was quoted by Israeli radio as urging Israel to hold off on its response to show Washington "It cannot pull this rope with us any tighter."

Israel, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinians were invited last week to the Washington talks, which are a follow-up to the Madrid peace conference that began at the end of October. Only Jordan has accepted thus far.

The Palestinians have not formally agreed to attend the next round but have indicated they are inclined to do so. The head of the Palestinian delegation, Haidar Abdul Shafi, expressed concern Sunday that the United States might seek to exclude delegation advisers with PLO ties.

"Palestinians are not asking for anything exceptional but to be treated like other delegations," Abdul Shafi said in a Jordanian television interview.

"But my personal feeling is that the United States will respond favorably to the Palestinian request for visas for the advisers," he said.

The Palestine Liberation Organization was formally excluded from the Madrid talks because Israel considers it a terrorist organization and refuses to deal with it. But the PLO consulted closely with the Palestinian delegation before, during and after the Madrid session.

The PLO has been seeking to maintain its role in the debate over where to hold the next round of talks.

PLO officials in Damascus said PLO chief Yasser Arafat sent a senior envoy to the Syrian capital Sunday for talks with Syrian leaders about the coming negotiations and their timing and venue.

Syria has stalled in responding to the U.S. invitation in an apparent effort to force Israeli concessions. Lebanon has not responded but is likely to follow the lead of Damascus

Handicapped parking rules OK

Double permit requirement legal, K-State attorney says

University Attorney Richard Seaton has made his interpretation of the handicap parking laws. Leah Cunick's ticket stands.

Earlier this semester Cunick, junior in fine arts, was disabled because of a broken hip. She was given a parking ticket for not having a campus permit.

Cunick did, however, have a temporary permit issued by the state of Kansas which allowed her to park in stalls reserved for the handicapped.

"My interpretation of the law is it still permits us to charge that (permit) fee," Seaton said. "The only thing we can't charge is a parking meter fee (to the disabled)."

John Lambert, director of public safety, asked Seaton in a letter late September for his opinion if the University was still within the law to charge disabled students to park on campus.

Seaton responded in a letter to the Department of Public Safety. "Since other fees are not mentioned, and since the primary purpose of the act appears to be uniform identification, it is my opinion that our local campus rule requiring a parking permit and associated fee is not inconsistent with the provisions of the statute."

The 1991 Session Laws of Kansas state a vehicle with the proper disability identification may park in any parking space, whether on public or private property, and may do so for an unlimited amount of time. However, according to K-State Traffic and Parking Regulations, the spaces designated for handicapped parking on

Believers win College Bowl

John Hawks, sophomore in English, reacts to missing a question in Sunday's College Bowl sponsored by the Union Program Council. Hawks was captain of Nocturnal Emissions. The team lost to The Believers 120-110 in the championship round Sunday.

Team advances to regional competition with victory over The Nocturnal Emissions

Gustav Holst's famous 1916 suite "The Planets" has seven parts, each named for a planet. For 10 points apiece—which two planets did he leave out?

Earth and Pluto.

That was one of the bonus questions answered in College Bowl, a question and answer game involving quick responses.

The Varsity Sport of the Mind, as the bowl was called, was a two-day tournament which took place in the K-State Union's Forum Hall over the weekend. The tournament was run by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

College Bowl Headquarters, Inc. in California distributes the questions and rules through the Association of College Unions-International.

Charla Bailey, graduate assistant for the Union, said College Bowl is the world's longest running general knowledge quiz. It will celebrate its 40th anniversary in 1992.

"It's a great opportunity for students to compete using their minds and their education," Bailey said.

Issues and Ideas' chairman, John Towse, said the teams took the game very seriously.

"Toward the end, the competition became very intense," he said.

A team called The Believers beat The Nocturnal Emissions in the final round, giving them the opportunity to move on to regional competition which will be at K-State in February.

The winning team consisted of Camilla Forshey, sophomore in arts and sciences; Carrick Williams, sophomore in arts and sciences; Brent Deatrick, freshman in chemistry; and captain Paul Hough, junior in architectural engineering.

The team members were surprised they won because two of the members were on a losing team last year.

"We competed last year and came in fifth," Hough said. He also said the players were younger this year. "I'm glad it's over," Forshey said.

"It was a very stressful situation," Williams said. "I'm relieved."

The Believers were undefeated in the tournament.

Cheerleader van crashes as team travels to OSU

Friday accident near Chapman causes few injuries

CHRISTINE VENDEL

A van carrying eight members of the K-State cheerleading squad to Oklahoma State University rolled over twice and was so crushed the jaws of Life were used to cut the vehicle open to free two cheerleaders.

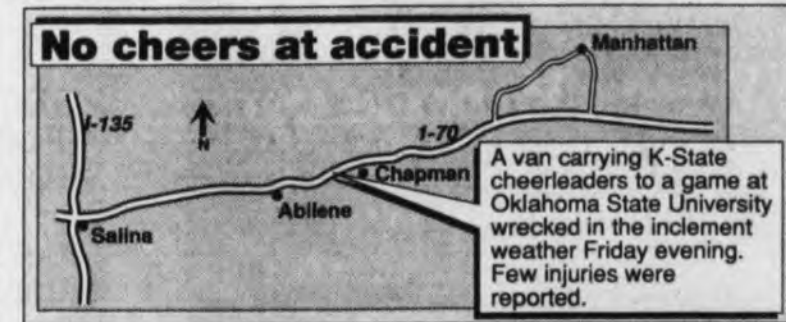

Although the vehicle was destroyed, most of the squad was not seriously hurt and went on to cheer at K-State's Saturday football game.

The accident occurred nine miles out of Abilene near Chapman on Interstate-70.

The van was driven by assistant cheerleading coach, Bill Gish and carried cheerleaders Marcus West, Kari Faust, Greg Winn, Shane Somers, Sam Bushey, Kami Knoll, Christine Ferguson and Jill Washington.

"Most of us came out without a scratch," said Washington. "But everyone's back and neck is really sore."

Two members of the squad, West and Faust, did not cheer at the Oklahoma State game because of the wreck. Faust was kept in the hospital overnight for observation. West came to the game, but was without a partner and in too much pain to do any stunts.

"I'm walking around like a grandpa," he said. Ferguson cheered at the game, but had to have three stitches, Gish was also treated at the hospital for cuts on his arm from the smashed driver's side window.

West said it was about 4 p.m. when he felt the van swerving because of the slippery road conditions.

"I was laying down, like most of us were, and I popped up my head and saw Bill trying to get control. He told everyone to hold on," he said. "The driver's side hit the ditch and dug in the ground which made us go airborne. We landed on the top of the van, then went back on the wheels, back on the roof and ended up on the wheels."

Washington said the van landed on its tires facing traffic in a ditch. "Five people ended up in one seat when there was originally only two," she said.

West said he and Faust were trapped in the van. "I got knocked out so I don't really remember what happened. They couldn't get to me though," he said. "Everyone who could crawled out. I

Man arrested in Topeka triple murder

TOPEKA (AP) — An Ottawa man was being held without bond Sunday on probable cause in the stabbing deaths of his former girlfriend and her two young daughters, police said.

The 30-year-old suspect, who was on probation for misdemeanor assault, was taken into custody Saturday at a convenience store one block from where Sherry Greeve, 27, and her daughters were killed and their house set afire, said Detective Craig Fox of the Topeka police homicide unit.

Greeve and daughters Lacey, 5, and Cagney, 4, were killed, but her 8-month-old son was rescued from the burning home, which was part of a four-plex in a housing project, police said.

The suspect was being held on three counts of first-degree murder, aggravated burglary and probation violation.

"The motive is still under investigation because we still have some people to talk to," Fox said, adding that the suspect was not the father of any of the children.

Violent spree leads to killer's death

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — A man went on a bloody rampage at his ex-girlfriend's home, stabbing her son to death and wounding six other people before police officers shot and killed him, police said Sunday.

Mark Harkin, 32, of Kansas City, Kan., was shot late Saturday night as he threatened a young child with a knife, said Sgt. Bill Edwards, a police department spokesman.

"There were a group of people at home playing cards, just having a quiet evening," Edwards said Sunday at a late-morning news conference.

Harkin also dropped three people, including the former girlfriend's mother and one of the girlfriend's children, from a second-story window of the apartment before police killed him, Edwards said.

The incident began about 11:30 p.m. when police got a call about a man barricaded into a house, Edwards said.

Police arrived and saw Harkin in a second-floor window, where he dropped the woman out.

He left the window and returned carrying a child of about 9 years.

"He cut the child and then threw the child to the ground," Edwards said. "He said he'd kill everyone in the house."

When officers arrived, "they were catching people this man was dropping," Edwards said.

Police entered the building and forced their way into a locked bedroom, where Harkin was holding a knife to another child. Officers shot and killed the man before the child was seriously injured, Edwards said.

Just a short interval of time passed between when the officers entered the house to when they shot Harkin, he said.

Harkin was apparently shot at least twice, Edwards said.

Queen's Mercury dies of pneumonia

LONDON (AP) — Rock musician Freddie Mercury, whose dramatic vocals helped make Queen one of the top pop music groups of the 1970s, died Sunday night of pneumonia brought on by AIDS, his publicist said.

Only a day earlier, the 45-year-old Mercury had ended intense media speculation about his health by issuing a statement that he was stricken with the disease.

Mercury died peacefully at his home in Kensington, west London, said his spokeswoman, Roxy Meade. "His death was the result of broncho-pneumonia brought on by AIDS," a statement from his publicity company said.

In his disclosure Saturday, Mercury said:

"I felt it correct to keep this information private to date in order to protect the privacy of those around me.

"However, the time has now come for my friends and fans around the world to know the truth, and I hope that everyone will join with me, my doctors and all those worldwide in the fight against this terrible disease."

Students organizing black sorority

Three women at K-State are trying to establish a local chapter of the black sorority, Sigma Gamma Rho.

Kristel Jackson, senior in interior design; Sheryl Smith, junior in pre-occupational therapy; and Lynette Harris, junior in electrical engineering, pledged the sorority this summer through the University of Kansas' chapter, Eta Iota.

"We would like to offer the females here at K-State an opportunity for an alternative," Jackson said, "because when I was growing up, all I saw were Deltas and AKAs."

Smith said Sigma Gamma Rho encourages and promotes high scholastic achievement, development of leadership skills and individual talents.

Membership is not limited to black women, Harris said. Anyone who is willing to serve the community is welcome.

"All sororities serve a purpose, but I think people should be in the sorority where they feel real sisterhood," Harris said.

The three women said black unity, not just black greek unity is important.

"We are trying to think of projects that can unite all the greeks together so we can do more for society as a whole," Harris said.

K-State currently has three other black sororities: Alpha Kappa Alpha; Delta Sigma Theta and Zeta Phi Beta.

Yugoslavian cease-fire fails

Croatian fighting continues as truce deadline passes

By the Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia — Fighting continued in Croatia Sunday even though a new cease-fire was to take effect in the secessionist republic and pave the way for the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers.

Thirteen previous truce agreements mediated by the European Community all failed to halt the fighting in the 5-month-old civil war, and the United Nations says it will not send peacekeepers unless a cease-fire holds.

In Rome, U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar said he was "hopeful" about the latest truce.

No specific time was set for the cease-fire to take effect, and there were no signs that the warring sides were complying.

Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic indicated it might take some time for the truce to take firm hold. "It has to be taken into account that the road from ideas and proposals to their implementation is neither easy nor simple," he told the Belgrade daily Politika.

Cyrus Vance, the U.N. envoy who mediated the latest agreement on Saturday, said both sides seemed to sincerely want peacekeepers and he hinted at a possible compromise on how such a force would be deployed.

Serbia has called for peacekeepers to separate ethnic groups on Croatian territory. Croatia, which fears that separation would legitimize the seizure of about a third of Croatian territory by Serb forces, wants the peacekeepers on the official border between the republics.

But Vance said U.N. troops might be sent to "flashpoints" in the conflict, which began after Croatia declared independence in June.

"The simple drawing of a line and putting troops along that line has not proved over the years a very practical way 'to preserve peace,'" Vance said after briefing Perez de Cuellar about the truce accord.

Vance said he hoped an agreement on peacekeeping forces could be worked out within a week.

Thousands of people have been killed in the civil war. Croat officials said fighting continued Sunday, mostly around Osijek, capital of the Slavonia region in eastern Croatia.

Attacks on the Croat stronghold intensified last week after Vukovar, a town 20 miles away on the Danube River border with Serbia, fell to the Serb-dominated federal army. Osijek has been shelled almost daily for several months and was nearly encircled by the army and fighters from Croatia's Serb minority.

The Osijek hospital reported nine people were killed and 46 wounded over the previous 24 hours.

Laslovo, a strategically important village south of Osijek, was captured Sunday, the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug and Croatian sources said.

Refugees continued to flee Osijek, a city of 140,000 people and surrounding villages. Hungarian state radio said 1,500 refugees, including six busloads of school children, crossed into Hungary at one border point alone by midday. More than 2,300 crossed into Hungary on Saturday.

Attacks were reported by local Croat officials on and around Karlovac, a federal army garrison town 30 miles southwest of Zagreb, Croatia's capital. Croat officials said there also was an artillery attack on Nova Gadiška, 80 miles southeast of Zagreb.

Fighting also was reported on the main highway between Zagreb and Belgrade, the federal and Serbian capital.

Vance said it was "very important" that the cease-fire accord requires Croatian forces to lift their blockade of Yugoslav army barracks in the republic.

"One of the big problems that has led to the continuation of the fighting has been the blockading of those barracks," said Vance, former U.S. secretary of state under President Carter.

About 200 federal soldiers began withdrawing from the Pleso barracks at Zagreb airport Sunday, Croatian radio reported. That was in accordance with an agreement reached Friday for the army to leave barracks around Zagreb within 15 days.

Croatia declared independence on June 25 along with Slovenia. After several days of fierce fighting in Slovenia, the Serb-dominated federal government dropped its opposition to independence for the ethnically homogeneous republic.

Kansas AIDS risk equal to New York

Number of rural cases increases faster than spread of urban epidemic

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

People in Kansas are no less likely to get AIDS than people in New York. "The rural epidemic grows faster than the urban, even if the absolute numbers are lower," said Sten Vermund, chief of the AIDS epidemiology division, National Institutes of Health, in Bethesda, Md.

Speaking to different groups while in Manhattan for three days, Sten Vermund, chief of the AIDS epidemiology division, National Institutes of Health, in Bethesda, Md., said Saturday the emerging rural growth of AIDS cannot yet be seen in statistics because of its incubation time of 10 years between infection and symptoms.

"The AIDS statistics of 1992 reflect the HIV transmission of 1982," he said.

He said the urgency of prevention and sex education of college students in the 1990s goes far beyond what was an issue in the 1970s.

"In the early 1990s, college students face potentially lethal and incurable viruses that go far beyond those of the early 1970s. Today, they must develop a maturity regarding sexually transmitted diseases that complies with those probable encounters," Vermund said.

College students will inevitably explore sexuality, he said, but people need to take responsibility for themselves and their sex partners.

"People think, 'It's not going to affect me,'" he said. "People don't think probability but play the lottery. They don't use the same logic. Serial monogamy also leads to multiple sex partners."

Vermund said campuses in the future will have to deal with AIDS. Campuses won't be the primary locations affected by the epidemic because inner-city youths and drug us-

Dear Memorial Hospital:

On July 12, '91 we were on our way home from Las Vegas on I-70 when we were involved in a car accident. We were scared and stranded in a town we knew nothing about. Your hospital staff and paramedics were so warm and friendly that we felt almost at home. We felt as though we were given Red Carpet treatment. We probably will not have an opportunity to return to your hospital in the future, but if we ever happen to be in Manhattan again and require medical treatment, we certainly will choose or recommend Memorial. Words cannot explain the gratitude that we feel. We have come in contact with several big hospitals in St. Louis, but none as friendly as Memorial. We certainly wish you were located closer to home.

Your hospital truly has a special group of people. Keep up the good work.

Bramlage finally finds its seat

A hearty congratulations goes out to those at Bramlage Coliseum who helped make American Gladiators and the Queensrÿche concert successes.

Although there were only about 4,000 people at Queensrÿche, everyone found their seat.

Bramlage staff is notorious for mismatching and poorly arranging the seating for concerts and events. Who can forget about the more than 40 people who were moved from the fifth row to "the nose-bleed section" last year at the AC/DC concert because the stage was too big, or the intimidated usher who put a seat in the aisle for a student because he didn't want to move the Wefalds during the George Carlin concert.

With the past two events behind us without a glitch, it seems the Bramlage staff is, however, improving.

The improvement could be accredited to Queensrÿche using a stage owned by Bramlage and specially built to fit in the coliseum.

Communication between the group and officials at Bramlage is important. A policy should be made to handle the dilemma of a group's stage being too large to fit properly in the coliseum. In this situation, the group should be greatly encouraged to use the "house stage."

Concerts are just beginning to go well again at Bramlage, but there is still room for improvement.

Croatia needs media attention

A full-fledged civil war erupted in Europe for the first time in decades — and no one noticed.

When Croatia announced its independence from Yugoslavia in August, a war erupted between the Croats and the neighboring republic of Serbia.

At the same time, the Soviet coup occurred, stealing the headlines in world papers.

The conflict raged on throughout the following months. There was a deadly battle for the city of Vukovar. Meanwhile, Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill topped American papers.

European-backed cease-fires were made and broken weekly. Historic monuments, cathedrals and museums were being destroyed. A country's identity, its history and its culture were being erased.

And no one noticed.

The war is nearly over now. The Croats and Serbs have, for the most part, reached a stalemate. Another cease-fire is in place, one the European Community says should stand.

Throughout the war, George Bush took a hands-off stance, but how many Americans knew?

Wars are an integral part of current affairs. They alter both the present and future. The media's poor handling of this conflict is an outrage. So is the apathy of those who depend on the media to bring them the news.

If the media and their followers had taken a stand like the two Yugoslav factions did, maybe a peaceful solution could have been found earlier. The world media is a powerful instrument. Wars can be avoided simply by having media coverage of the problems before conflicts turn bloody.

When the media is not involved, it becomes an instigator of war. This is a lesson we have been forced to learn the hard way.

Campus deserves a ticket campout

More than 7,000 fans witnessed as the Wildcats beat the hell out of the University of Texas-San Antonio Saturday night.

That's quite a crowd for a nearly brand-spanking new 13,500 seat arena. Not.

The Cats just may have their best season in a couple of years, but no one will be there to witness it. The reason being, in our opinion — the elimination of the campout for season basketball tickets.

After a mediocre basketball season last year, the athletic department came up with a master plan in eliminating support for the basketball team.

The K-State campout was famous the world over. It put K-State on the front page of USA Today and in the pages of Sports Illustrated. It was something that made publicity-happy President Jon Wefald famous. But evidently the campout made somebody uneasy, as fun things at K-State tend to do.

But it's time for a change.

We want the campout back, and we want it now. A basketball team such as the one this year only comes around once in a great blue moon, yet it will take some sort of massive publicity stunt to get students buying tickets.

Next year, with a campout, maybe we won't have the empty seats we have this year.

BISON or Bureaucrat

The United States has lost a treasured symbol and gained a despised institution

BRITT LONG GUEST

Through some totally inexplicable freak accident, often cited as "The Way We Won the West," the millions of American bison that once stopped traffic from Texas to Saskatchewan were replaced, almost unit for unit, by U.S. government bureaucrats, employees and general hangers-on, all having at the "public" monies like shoots on a sow.

While this is not widely recognized as a disturbing trend in American history, I would like to present a few points that will illustrate the staggering opportunity costs involved in investing in bureaucrats instead of bison.

A bureaucrat must present a business card before a positive identification can be made. One is forced to wonder about the proportion of woodlands decimation that can be directly traced to the identification needs of bureaucrats. Bison place no such demands on the continent's forests, causing approximately no trees to be felled. One can assert that in the handful of instances in which a buffalo was responsible for the death of a tree the unfortunate fatality was caused by an accidental collision.

Let us now move on to the contributions made by the buffalo and the bureaucrat, respectively.

A bison fertilizes his environment with his excrement, nourishing plant life and renewing the soil. Though a bureaucrat often produces a prodigious amount of bullshit, he fails to fertilize so much as the office plant with this product and can seldom be said to have seen actual dirt except, perhaps, in his politics.

Bison are nomadic creatures, leaving any given area before they exhaust its resource base. Bureaucrats, the epitome of sedentecism, will not move three inches until the well has run as dry as a Baptist church social.

Buffalo provide an excellent source of low-fat, low-cholesterol preservative-laden protein. The sclerotic liver is especially rich in iron. Bureaucrats provide an excellent source of high-fat, high-cholesterol, preservative-laden protein. The sclerotic liver is best discarded unless one is interested in a carcinogenic contact-buzz.

If one skins a buffalo and prepares the skin correctly, one is left with an extremely warm robe or coat that will last a lifetime. If one skins a bureaucrat one is left with a minimum of 15-20 at Leavenworth that may last a lifetime.

Finally, bison feed themselves whereas bureaucrats, fed through "public funding," couldn't feed themselves if you gave them all 40 acres and a John Deere.

For vegetarians, the behavioral characteristics of bison and bureaucrat also provide grounds for the prioritization of "public" expenditures.

In terms of temperament, even the most misanthropic of bison is a devotee of passive resistance. Ninety-nine times out of 100 a buffalo will turn the other cheek and stand waiting for one's departure, even if derogatory references about his lineage, such as "Your mom's big and hairy," have been made. The same principle of Christian forgiveness cannot be said to apply to the bureaucrat.

Even the rare buffalo bent on murder is less dreadful than a like-minded bureaucrat. With the buffalo it will all be over in a matter of minutes, while the bureaucrat will do his utmost to bore one to death over a period of years. If the buffalo relents, one might be left with a few broken bones. If the bureaucrat is somehow dragged away, snarling, foaming at the mouth and ranting about procedure, one is likely to have suffered permanent brain damage from the incalculable stress of uninterrupted boredom.

For you aesthetes, a cursory glance at both parties leads one to the swift conclusion that it is far more pleasant to contemplate the visage of even the most slovenly buffalo than that of the pasty-faced, soft-fleshed bureaucrat. Perhaps it is mere addle-pated romanticism, but I contend that there is more poetry in a single buffalo chip than in a gross of bureaucrats. Bison have been venerated, painted and even grace the flag of Wyoming. They can, therefore, be regarded as a patron of the arts, an inspiration to the creative mind. Bureaucrats cannot be said even to have inspired the architects who invariably turn out perfectly uniform, perfectly square, perfectly soporific buildings for their bureaucratic functions.

Thus, the American bison has been proven more consistent, more straightforward, more useful, more inspiring, more self-sufficient and a better Christian than the American bureaucrat. Logic dictates that all necessary measures be taken to ensure the return of the former and the demise of the latter. Fortunately, American capitalism facilitates the extermination of any species, provided there's a profit in it somewhere. It might even be possible to resurrect the methodology responsible for the current paucity of bison, not to mention poetically just.

Though bureaucrats, for reasons already stated, prove a poor food source, (here I borrow from Swift), there is no reason why, once a sufficient number have been bagged through a bounty system commonly used to eradicate any pernicious species, they should not be sold to the pork farmers of America (pigs will eat anything). The bounty system will provide useful employment for the un or underemployed. If the FBI were included on the list of fair game, it might yield a new pastime for whole sections of the country. It is a rare non-bureaucrat who is not cheered by the prospect of blowing large holes in any bureaucrat he or she has ever met. Therefore, one might expect a significant improvement in national morale, not to mention the national economy.

Bison or bureaucrat? Having laid bare the qualities possessed by one and the disadvantages posed by the other, as well as a possible course of action designed to rectify a woefully unbalanced situation which, unchecked, promises only further deterioration, I can do no more.

The choice, as always, rests with the American People — "of the people, by the people, for the people." Perhaps we should all write our congressperson, form a lobby in Washington, get the ear of an influential senator or make this whole bison thing a campaign issue. Maybe we could even run a candidate. Yeah, if you got the right secretary of the interior in there What's that? You want to see my business card?

KRISTI HUMSTON GUEST

Giving. 'Tis the season of giving. I'm definitely one of those people who forgets about giving every once in a while — usually as I consider eating the entire turkey my Grandmother fixes at Thanksgiving and finishing all the pumpkin pies as well. Then, there's also that grocery store scene: I wander through the aisles looking for the "ideal" food to fix for supper, until I finally decide the heck with it and head for the fast-food buffet instead.

It's undoubtedly ridiculous that we do this in a world where many individuals — right here in Manhattan — aren't fortunate enough to be given a choice. It's time the world takes action toward the hunger situation it has developed instead of sitting back and only saying, "Yes, I suppose there is a problem."

It's one thing to agree that something needs to be done, but it's quite another to actually get out of our own kitchens and try to do something about it. Now, maybe I've got your curiosity going here, so let me tell you what's going on.

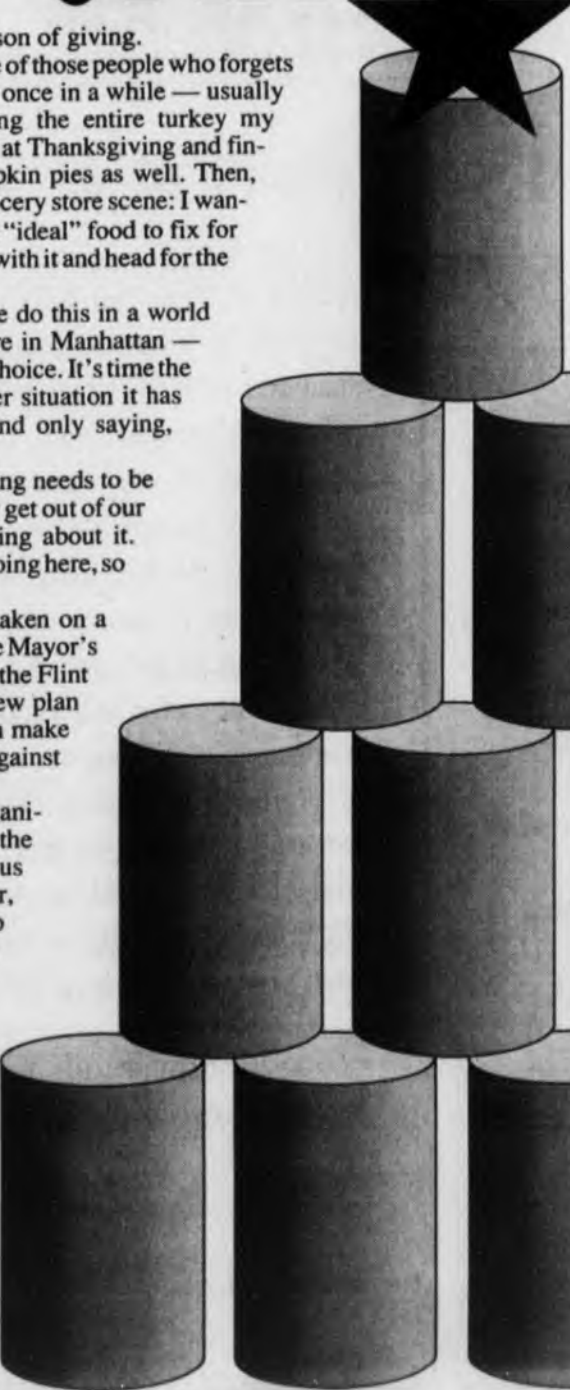

A group of K-State students has taken on a community project. Like the idea of the Mayor's Holiday Tree, a project organized by the Flint Hills Breadbasket of Manhattan, a new plan has been designed. And this plan can make the University contribute to the fight against hunger.

In previous years, many campus organizations have collected items during the holiday season for donating to various community organizations. This year, however, students are attempting to go about the situation a bit differently. The difference is called the K-State Holiday Tree.

The Union Program Council will sponsor Winter Wonderland activities Dec. 2-8. During this week, decorations will appear in the K-State Union. Santa will come to visit all us adorable college kids, and there will be fun times for all.

In addition to all this entertainment, however, will be a special project in the Union Courtyard. This is where we can make a difference.

CAN YOU GIVE THIS SEASON?

The K-State Holiday Tree — better understood as a bunch of canned goods piled into a triangle to resemble a Christmas tree with the true intentions of holiday spirit — will be constructed by many K-Staters. Each and every one of us will be responsible for making this project a success, and every canned good donated will mean something special to the person who receives it. The tree will be completed Dec. 8, and all the donated goods will be taken to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, an organization designed to minimize hunger and poverty at the local level with the distribution of available food.

You may have noticed, or will soon be noticing, signs posted at many locations on campus. These are intended to catch everyone's attention — and everyone's caring heart as well. We've all got it in us somewhere to help anyone who needs our help, and you are being asked to lend a hand.

No matter what you contribute, it will be appreciated, and, as long as the item is canned or packaged, it will be used for a considerably worthwhile cause. I know many residence halls, Greek houses, student organizations and private groups already make it a point to contribute goods on their own, but, this year, let's take it a step further and do it all together.

Those people in large organizations can go ahead and gather a box or two of goods, but instead of taking it all on yourself, contribute the materials to the K-State Holiday Tree. A giant card will sit beside the tree, and each individual or group who adds to the tree can sign it. When the items are delivered to the Breadbasket, you will earn recognition for a good deed, and you will become one of many who made the project a great success.

Big-play Cats finish season 7-4

36-26 victory over Oklahoma State gives K-State best record since 1954

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

STILLWATER, Okla. — Mission accomplished.

The K-State football team concluded the third chapter of its improbable turnaround story Saturday afternoon, downing Oklahoma State 36-26 and finishing the year with a record of 7-4.

In so doing, the Wildcats finished a season with seven wins for the first time since 1954, and finished a Big Eight campaign with four wins for the first time since 1970.

The icing on this cake? The win over the Cowboys was the third straight for the Cats, the first time a K-State team has won three to close out a season since 1934.

To steal an oft-quoted line from a beer commercial, it doesn't get any better than this.

"I'm happy for an awful lot of these guys," Snyder said. "I'm pleased they're able to walk out the door with a real understanding that they've accomplished an awful lot."

As Snyder and his players will tell you, the caper to this season was far from a work of art. K-State rolled to an early 19-0 lead, only to seemingly kick it into cruise control and allow the winless Cowboys, 0-10-1, to slowly inch back into the contest.

But, as has been the case of late, K-State made all the plays it needed to make — on both sides of the ball — to send an opponent home unhappy.

It was the big-play nature of the offense and special teams — as had been the case in the season-opening victory — that enabled K-State to keep the early lead safely tucked away.

Fumble recoveries by Elijah Alexander and Steve Moten, interceptions by Chris Patterson and William Price and a blocked punt by Tom Byers gave the Cats all of the breaks they needed to keep OSU at bay.

"When they turned the ball over to us, it seemed like it always gave us a chance (to score), and it changed field position," Snyder said. "When we got the turnovers and didn't have to move very far on offense, it gave us a chance to breathe a little easier."

Also giving Snyder a chance to breathe a bit more easily on this day were offensive standouts Eric Gallon and Russ Campbell.

Gallon rushed for 176 yards on 33 carries, including a 30-yard touchdown burst late in the second quarter that moved him over the 1,000-yard mark on the year and gave K-State the aforementioned 19-0 edge.

K-State's Michael Smith failed to become second in Big Eight career pass receiving.

The junior tailback, who ended the year with 1,102 yards — second on the K-State single-season rushing charts behind Isaac Jackson's 1,137 — had no idea that the touchdown romp pushed him over the top.

"When I came to the sideline, they told me I was 10 yards short," Gallon recounted. "But then, Coach Grogan (Tom, Gallon's position coach) came over and told me I got it. It was a relief. The first thing that came into my mind was not to get any negative yards."

Campbell had anything but negative yardage on this day, a day in which the Cowboy defenders keyed on probable all-conference performer Michael Smith and held him to just one catch for six yards.

A senior tight end, Campbell was the beneficiary of the Cowboys' strategy, roaming the secondary freely for an eight-catch, 169-yard day.

"They had developed some schemes that let us open it up to Russ," said Cat quarterback Paul Watson, who hit Campbell on a 27-yard TD strike late in the fourth quarter for the final K-State score. "They thought a linebacker could tie onto Russ, and we knew that they were wrong."

The only K-Stater who had reason to be unhappy this day was Smith, whose tough day left him 23 yards short of becoming the Big Eight's second-best all-time in yardage amassed in a career.

But the unselfish senior said his work had been done, though the individual goal was missed.

"Seven and four. That was the goal," said Smith, who walked up the ramp leaving the field after the contest with Snyder, beaming all the while. "Coach was trying to get it to me at the end, but unfortunately, it didn't work out. 'Still, I'm satisfied with what I got.' In fact, Campbell's TD reception came on a play designed to go to Smith. Watson, finding his favorite target covered, checked off and found Campbell at the back of the endzone.

One thing worked when another wouldn't. That, it seemed, might have been a good way to summarize K-State's year.

"We didn't play the kind of football we should have played today," Gallon said. "But we did win. That's what matters."

Campbell thanks God for good week on and off the field

CHRISTINE VENDEL

Senior tight end Russ Campbell has had quite a week.

He caught eight passes for 169 yards in K-State's 36-26 win over Oklahoma State Saturday. Earlier in the week, an announcement was made that the Wichita native received a post-graduate scholarship for $18,000 from the National Football Foundation.

Russ Campbell

"It has been a good week," Campbell said. "God has provided for all of my needs."

Campbell's good fortune couldn't have been better epitomized than it was on Saturday. His receiving day set records in several categories.

In addition to both totals being career highs, the 169 receiving yards he compiled were the most ever by a K-State tight end, and ranked him sixth among the Cats' top single-game performances by a receiver.

Campbell also eclipsed 1,000 yards for his career, marking the first time in Big Eight history a team has had three 1,000-yard receivers in uniform at the same time. Campbell joined fellow seniors Michael Smith and Frank Hernandez.

"Russ had an awful lot of yards," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "He hits you like a sledgehammer and keeps on going."

Campbell said before the game he thought he was going to have a good day against Oklahoma State.

"I really did. I get strength from the Lord to play the game and thought he would give me the strength today," he said.

Campbell said the improvising by quarterback Paul Watson aided in his successful game.

"Watson made real good reads," Campbell said. "I had a lot of help."

Oklahoma State's strategy of keying on Smith forced Watson to divide his passes among other receivers.

"Michael Smith is such a threat," Watson said. "They were worried about Smith and thought one linebacker could tie it on with Russ. That

Quarterback fulfills dream with game-winning drive

SCOTT PASKE

A skinny, thin-faced boy jogged on to the KSU Stadium turf Saturday with one chance left to fulfill a dream.

"Ever since January, this is all we ever wanted," the boy said later. "From all those days in the weight room up through today."

What the boy and his friends wanted was a state high school football championship. What it required was the maturity of men.

And a leader.

The boy, a slender lad named Brian, huddled his troops with 1:46 left in the Class 5A championship game. The mission: Move the football 45 yards in the remaining time against a group of hard-hitting defenders from Liberal.

For Brian, last-minute heroics had become commonplace in the previous two weeks. He had led his Blue Valley-Stilwell teammates to a 10-7 win over defending state champion Pittsburg with a drive that set up a game-winning field goal on the final play. A week later, his touchdown with five seconds remaining completed one of the wildest comebacks in Kansas playoff history, as the Tigers overcame a 26-0 fourth-quarter deficit to beat Highland Park 28-26.

And here, with less than two minutes left in his high school football career, he was asked to do it again.

For Liberal, that was bad news. Brian, whose last name happens to be the same as Kansas City Chiefs' coach Marty Schottenheimer, hit teammate Matt Vandree with a pass on the first play. Liberal's pressure had foiled the play and limited it to a 1-yard gain. With no timeouts, the senior quarterback tossed the ball out-of-bounds to stop the clock.

For the Tigers on the sidelines and their fans in the stands, it was time for divine intervention. The players, about 30 of them, dropped to their knees in unison and held hands. Moms, dads and friends stood behind them with fists clenched in prayer. Black and gold pom-poms were the only things that obstructed their grips.

On third and 9, Schottenheimer started the ritual of ripping another opponent's heart out. He hit Vandree over the middle for a 22-yard gain down to the Redskins' 22.

But Liberal would not fold. Schottenheimer's first pass fell incomplete. His second was a floater, forced by the Redskins' heavy rush they placed on the Tiger quarterback. Still, the senior's poise was evident, as Schottenheimer nearly completed the miracle pass to Vandree in the end zone.

Not this time. It was third down. "We knew what we had to do all the way," Schottenheimer said. "A field goal wasn't going to do us any good."

"I just wanted to keep everybody calm."

That task became nearly impossible as Schottenheimer's third-down pass for Vandree was incomplete.

Fourth down. "I just knew these kids would find a way to win," Blue Valley coach Steve Rampsy said.

His intuition was proven wrong. Schottenheimer's pass sailed over the head of his intended receiver and three Liberal defenders.

The game, for all practical purposes, was over. Blue Valley was out of chances. But no. A yellow flag flew at the group of players closest to the resting football.

Pass interference on Liberal. The dream was still alive.

"That ball wasn't even catchable," Liberal coach Gary Cornelison said. "That's what was sad."

A new season begins

Illinois-Chicago will be first challenge

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Life after Diana, Nadira and Kristie begins tonight for the Lady Cat basketball team.

Coach Susan Yow's squad opens its 1991-92 season in Chicago against Illinois-Chicago, minus Diana Miller, Nadira Hazim and Kristie Bahner.

The trio provided K-State with scoring, rebounding and solid floor leadership, but all were lost to graduation.

That leaves Mary Jo Miller to run the show for K-State. Yow is confident that her senior point guard will do the job.

"Mary Jo will have a significant impact on the team," Yow said of the Minnesota native who is the school's career, season and single-game assist leader.

Miller will likely have to increase her scoring output this season as well, if the Lady Cats' lone exhibition tilt is any indication.

In a 94-45 loss to the German National Team on Nov. 15 in Bramlage Coliseum, Leah Honeycutt was the leading scorer for the squad, tossing in 13 points in 35 minutes of playing time.

In addition, the K-State reserves were outscored 48-26.

It was not a pretty sight.

"We can become a better team, and we will become a better team," Yow said of the team's performance against the German Nationals and the season to come. "We truly will."

Whether the Lady Cats will improve will depend, in large part, on the emergence of several newcomers.

The K-State team Yow will see on the floor and on the bench tonight includes six freshmen and a junior college transfer.

That junior college transfer is one reason Yow is optimistic about the days to come.

Jaime White, a Kodak junior college All-American from Utah Valley Community College, averaged 18.8 points an outing last year and was Region 18 player of the year.

"Jaime is a definite to come in and help us immediately," Yow said of the 6-foot, junior forward.

Others likely to make an impact beginning tonight and for the rest of the year, Yow said, include senior center Jennifer Grebing, junior guard Kelly Moylan, and the aforementioned Honeycutt.

Yow said this season is an important one in the history of the program. Last year's Lady Cat team went 16-11 overall and 8-6 in the Big Eight.

"This is a significant year in our program," said Yow, who is in her second year as the Lady Cat coach. "We're a young team and we're learning to be intense, but we have a long way to go."

A first step could come tonight against Illinois-Chicago, which lost to KU 70-60 Saturday night.

ers, the main risk groups, are usually underrepresented in the student body. There will, however, be a wave of HIV-positive students, although many HIV-infected adolescents will die before they reach college age.

"The issue on campus is the sexual-ity issue," Vermund said.

Health educators need to become more active, he said.

"Student health services and related sciences ought to urge people into a more healthy lifestyle in general," Vermund said. "I feel very strongly people need to hear the health-education message."

He suggested educators should encourage students to help educate their peers.

"Peer education is more effective than top-down education," he said. "The most useful reinforcement of a healthy lifestyle comes from students talking to students."

Vermund said peer education between older and younger homosexuals has proved to be very successful.

"Those groups have had an enormous effect in terms of self-help and reaching out," he said.

On campuses, gay and bisexual men dominate the HIV-positive students.

"There is the problem of those not hearing the health messages," Vermund said.

He said society also has an obligation to mediate the healthy message and create group norms determining acceptable sexual behavior concerning AIDS.

"I'd like to have the social norm in the United States that it is not OK to have multiple sex partners or unsafe sex," he said. "We need to create group norms about acceptable sexual behavior in grade school."

"I'd also like to see the entire United States go into needle exchange programs for drug users," Vermund said. "That doesn't cost much money, but is very efficient."

Needle exchange programs hand out clean, sanitary needles to drug users in exchange for their used ones. Vermund said a recent study conducted in New Haven, Conn., found the incidence of new HIV infection in drug users decreased by 33 percent if needles were exchanged.

campus are not for eight-hour use while working or attending classes.

Tom Hufford, secretary/treasurer of Students With Handicap Concerns and senior in accounting, said his group will look into changing K-State's time restriction on handicapped parking, but agrees with Seaton's interpretation.

"After reading the regulation myself, I see where his interpretation comes from," Hufford said. "There's nothing we can do about it."

People with handicap parking permits are also exempt from any parking meter fees. The only exception is where a stall is reserved for a specific disabled individual.

Disabled individuals would be allowed to park in the metered lots without a campus permit if there are no handicap parking spaces available.

Cunnick said she thinks Seaton's interpretation of the law is wrong and plans to call the department for federal complaints about the matter.

wasn't the case."

Campbell agreed.

"There wasn't a real plan to go to the tight end all the time, but we knew in some formations, the tight end would have a good chance," he said.

Snyder said schemes used by opposing defenses earlier in the season prevented Campbell from piling up the totals he did on Saturday.

"We have great balance in our offense," he said. "Their defense dictates what we do. Some people line up and take things away from Russ. If so, we throw to someone else."

"When they take one player away, tried to but they told me not to move since they knew my back hurt."

West said Emergency Medical Technicians brought the Jaws of Life device to cut them out of the van.

"We were in there 45 minutes. It was cold because all of the windows were knocked out. They cut out all the seats and doors. Then they put us on two spine boards for our backs and IVs to get us warmed up," he said.

Washington said the highway patrol got to the scene of the accident quickly.

"There was another accident across the highway and so the highway patrol was right there," she said.

West said he and Faust met the rest of the cheerleaders at a hospital in Abilene where they stayed from about 5 to 10 p.m.

After cheerleading sponsor Scott Johnson was notified, he got another van and drove to Abilene.

"I knew we needed to either get them back here or to Stillwater," he there's weaker defense somewhere else."

The K-State head coach said Campbell has improved along with the whole team this year.

"That's one of our goals, to have them be better individuals every day," Snyder said. "Russ is a guy who subscribes to that philosophy."

Campbell said there have been a lot of dark times for him at K-State, and although this week would be construed as one of the good times, it is still not the best.

"Seeing the program turn around is the best part," he said.

Snyder said of all the seniors: "I appreciate their toughness and per-said.

West said the consensus among the cheerleaders was to go to Stillwater for the game.

"We were only two hours away, and it was the last game for the seniors so we wanted to go," he said. "Right before we got in the new van we all took a deep breath, and it was funny, everyone sat in the same seats they were in for the wreck. We talked about it all the way to Stillwater and got there about 3 a.m."

Both West and Washington agreed it was a very scary experience.

"I remember being on the ceiling trying to stay away from the windows because they were all smashed out. I kept picturing my arm going out the window and being crushed," West said. "It was the most scariest thing in the world. I closed my eyes and when I opened them we were still rolling."

West said in addition to his sore back, there are other ramifications to this accident.

"I lost all of my books and homework, everything, it sucks. I need to talk to my teachers," he said.

severance. I'm going to miss them dearly."

But that doesn't mean Campbell has seen the last of football. Snyder said Campbell has an excellent opportunity to be involved in professional football.

"Not just in lieu of his performance today, but in the last couple of years," he said.

"I really feel like God has given me the talent to play. If he wants me to play at a professional level, He'll work it out," Campbell said. "I'm going to keep working out hard and play hard in those senior bowl games then see whether I get drafted."

—the main power broker in Lebanon. Arafat's decision to send an envoy to Damascus may indicate that the PLO is leaning toward Syria's position.

However, a top aide to Arafat said Saturday that the Palestinian delegation will attend the Washington meeting. Bassam Abu Sharif told the Moroccan radio station Medi1 that Washington was an excellent choice for the next round of talks.

In that round, Israel would meet with the envoys on an individual basis for bargaining over Palestinian self-rule and other issues, including Syria's demands for the return of territory seized during the 1967 Middle East War. Israel says it will not trade land for peace.

Shamir was not present for Sunday's Cabinet session. He was returning from Washington, where he met with President Bush.

Arriving at Ben Gurion airport, he told reporters he still hoped Washington would reconsider the site, expressing hope that they would hear in the next few days of an agreement that can also satisfy them.

But in an interview with CBS' "Face the Nation" taped Saturday night and broadcast Sunday, Shamir also said Israel would consider the invitation as it stood.

"I told the president I will have to consult my ministers and my government, and we will give our answer," he said.

Israel radio said the proposal may be taken up Wednesday at a regularly scheduled meeting of the decision-making Defense Cabinet.

Despite the dispute, Shamir suggested the peace process was still on track and that Israel would participate in further talks.

"The matter now is about some details. They are important details, but they could be worked out," he said on CBS. "Nobody could imagine that because of such a detail, this process will collapse."

Cabinet ministers across the political spectrum made it clear that the Jewish state was deeply angry over how they felt it was treated.

During the Cabinet session, Milo, the police minister, called the U.S. proposal a nervy ultimatum.

He told army radio, "I would make clear to the Americans that this attitude toward Israel won't help the peace process, only harm it."

Similar reactions also came from members of Shamir's coalition who are usually critical of Shamir's tough stance.

Interior Minister Arye Deri, an avid supporter of peace talks, said he was "very hurt. ... I am always for the process, but here we need to take moral accounts and put the Americans in their place on this issue."
